FEW LAWLESS IN YOSEMITE

YOSEMITE, Oct. 24.—Yosemite National Park is no place for bad actors. The annual report of United States Commissioner Degnan proves that beyond a doubt, for every infraction of the Park's law has been punished with a view to preventing repetition, and warning that the rights of the majority must be respected.

With nearly 100,000 visitors pouring into Yosemite from every state and many foreign countries, there have been only ninety-five cases before Judge Degnan in twelve months. "Moral turpitude," as the lawyers say, was not involved in most of the cases, thirty of which concerned traffic violations alone, so that the total number of "undesirables" among the Park's visitors was infinitesimal in relation to the enormous total.

Those few undesirables, however, soon learned that Yosemite not only didn't want them, but wouldn't have them, and they were pitched out, bag and baggage. Ranger Stations guard every exit from the Park and the country is so wild that it virtually is impossible to travel by other than an established road. Therefore, when a man is wanted, it becomes a comparatively simple matter to notify all exits and have him picked up when he arrives at one of them.
