Why Stop Being Courteous When Using Telephone?

"Give a thought to better telephone manners, voices and service," urges a writer in a recent issue of Women's Wear, and adds emphatically, "It will pay!"

Just how much will it pay? An experienced business man with whom this writer has discussed the subject sees in telephone courtesy one of the fundamental steps toward a return to more stable business conditions. "I predict," this business man is quoted as saying, "that if the department stores and offices would imperatively require pleasing manners and friendly, courteous voice to all telephone operators, the business would pick up fifty per cent, more quickly. What is so maddening and rasping for a speaker as to have the wire rattle in his ear and get a quickly-snapped-off, partial reply to his queries?"

"Suppose that when a customer calls up a store and asks for the salesperson by whom she is accustomed to be waited upon, the operator either said 'Miss A is not here but may somebody else take her place?' or 'Mr. B. is out— Isn't there something I may do to help you?' — Suppose real politeness and courteous interest sounded in the voice of the operator—wouldn't the customer appreciate that spirit of co-operation that tried to reduce a disadvantage to her to the least inconvenience? Of course she would. The errand she could not accomplish would at least be under-studied by the fine politeness of a representative of the house. After that the house would be raised in the estimation of the customer who couldn't get what she wanted, but who got something else that she liked."

"Business ought to consider the telephone voice and manner" as an important part of the requirement for the job of operator," the quotation continues. "Rudeness, either in voice or service, should be cause for dismissal."

Within the telephone family itself, courtesy so long ago became a cardinal virtue that "the voice with a smile" has become proverbial. Private branch exchange attendants have not been so quick to appreciate its importance, however. In common with the man quoted in

A RECORD WAS HUNG UP TODAY WHEN JOSIE BELL MADE A MILE IN 2:48

Women's Wear business executives are coming to realize that it is an asset which they cannot afford to value too highly. In hundreds of progressive offices and stores the new business slogan is "Give a thought to telephone courtesy."

MINING DOLLARS TO REPLACE WAR LOSS
SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 27.—Silver dollars which during the war were melted down and shipped to England as silver are now being replaced by the United States government, according to Superintendent M. J. Kelley of the San Francisco mint. Kelley said 280,000,000 silver dollars were sent overseas, and, in the movement to replace them, the local mint is turning out dollars at the rate of 360,000 a day.
