Says Planet Uncoördial

Lay Off Radio, Advises

STOCKHOLM, April 19.—The planet Mars—an old dying world—is receiving altogether too much attention from earthly scientists these days and nights, while the up-and-coming young planet Venus is just waiting for a chance to know us better.

This is the conclusion of Professor Svante Arrhenius, Nobel prize winner and one of Europe's foremost scientists and astronomers, who lectured here on the prospect of wheeling from the heavens the secrets of some of our celestial neighbors, and especially Mars, when that planet swings into closest proximity to the earth two years hence.

If scientists and long distance radio fans really want to communicate with some celestial neighbor, Professor Arrhenius said, they will not find Mars very cordial; but the old fellow—dying or already dead—is covered with hard frozen acid, and is so dry that its only rain is meteoric dust. Perhaps a few sea weeds still exist, he said, but it is highly improbable that even low animal life could find enough to sustain it. He described as "fantastic" the belief that the so-called canals observed on the planet were the work of engineers and attributed them to earthquake fissures.

Venus, on the other hand, offers potential possibilities to the patient astronomer, Professor Arrhenius declared. By "patient" he meant about a billion years, he explained. At the expiration of this period, he thought a flourishing colony of intelligent beings might be discovered on the bright little planet.

"Everything on Venus is dripping wet," he continued. "The planet is covered by constant rain clouds 10 kilometers thick, preventing any rays from the sun penetrating to the bottom of the air-strata. Life on the planet of love is short and intense."

Living organisms, he thought, might be found at the polar regions, where the temperature was slightly lower than other parts of the planet.

"When the earth is extinguished," he concluded, "it will be Venus, queen of the heavens, that will take over the role as carrier of culture."
