FARM READING

The editor of the Country Gentleman, conceded one of the best farm publications in the country, is indeed a gentleman, with a gentleman's conception of the truth that the maintenance of one's own rights and standing does not mean attack upon the rights of others.

We believe there are many publishers of periodicals devoted to special interests who share the views of the Country Gentleman's editor, but not all of them would consider it a duty incumbent upon them to so frankly admit their inadequacy to supply all the needs of their readers as does the Country Gentleman in the following paragraphs:

A county agent in the corn belt says that more Country Gentlemen are read in his county than are local newspapers.

We hope not. The country press is vitally important to local community development. Farmers particularly have need of the local newspaper. It announces the meetings of the farm bureau, Grange and local cooperatives. It is the medium through which the county agent can best issue detailed information. It is invaluable in building up pure-bred centers and in promoting good farms, good roads, schools, churches, Chautauques, and the like.

And finally, there is that other important function on the social side wherein the good local newspaper comes into the home and sits by the fireside as a guest and counselor, introducing neighbors to each other, promoting good feeling, keeping up the local morale; recording the births, graduations, marriages, broken limbs, hopes, aspirations and deaths of families; journeying with each from sunrise to sunset of life—a companionship which is beyond valuation.

When we hear of a good agricultural community where farmers do not support the local press it nearly always turns out to be where the newspapers do not understand farmers and fail to measure up to their opportunities of friendship and service.
