This Was Speedy Bird
Hatched Young on Train

SPOKANE, Wash., Sept. 21.— While traveling at the rate of 50 miles an hour a fond bluebird mother recently hatched two birds in a nest built in a broken classification light on the tank of a railroad engine running between here and Coeur d' Alene, Idaho.

The parents of the two young travelers started house-building operations about a month before the youngsters were hatched. Their nest was discovered by railroad men shortly afterwards. At the time of the discovery, the nest contained four eggs. Thinking that the eggs would not hatch, one of the enginemen took two of them home to be placed under a canary bird.

Mrs. Bluebird, apparently undaunted by the theft of two of her eggs, went ahead at the task at hand. About a month later the two young birds were discovered. The mother made all the trips regularly with the engine, before the birds were hatched.

"The train makes a hundred-mile round trip every other day," said Engineer J. E. Robinson. "Quite often the mother is delayed or something and we pull out without her, only to have her overtake the train and fly into her nest while we are going from 20 to 30 miles an hour. The light in which the birds made the nest is not in use."
