

"RED" PARKER HELD

Noted Buckaroo Alleged to Have Operated Elaborate Still

"Red" Parker well-known rider and buckaroo, who says his real name is W. P. Thompson, is in the toils of the law charged with the possession of intoxicating liquor in violation of the prohibition act, and with the possession of property in violation of this same act, to-wit: a still, copper coils and five barrels of mash. The still is reported to have about 20-gallon capacity. The complaint was sworn to in the office of United States Commissioner Bert C. Thomas this afternoon by Fred Baker, superintendent of the Klamath Indian reservation.

Baker, assisted by T. N. Snook and Deputies Overton and Shadley, raided Parker's place on Seven Mile creek and there discovered a cave-like room which had been sunk into the ground and cleverly roofed over with dirt, leaves and brush, with a small, square opening in the roof for an entrance. The liquor-making outfit was operated with gas compression torches and the room was lighted with a gas torch. Compression gages and other late appliances were used in connection with the manufacture. The cave itself was about 8x10 feet and comfortably high.

The still with five barrels of mash was confiscated and "Red" Parker, or Thompson, was taken into custody by the officers yesterday and brought here. Upon appearing before Commission Thomas this afternoon his bail was set for $1000, which he was confident of being able to raise. His hearing was set for 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Parker came here from Montana and has been residing on Seven Mile creek for about a year.
