SHELL COMPANY OF CALIFORNIA

Say It With Type

EVERY now and then we encounter the proprietor of a small business, who, when advertising is suggested as a means of expanding, answers: "I'd like to, but I can't afford it." Usually, we believe, he is sincere in thinking it, though sometimes the excuse is given merely to avoid the job of thinking the subject clear through to the end.

It often happens, that, to the inexperienced, the idea of expending money, even a small amount, for anything except rent and goods is a sort of financial scarecrow.

Yet the answer is plain and obvious. MOST OF THE BIG ADVERTISERS OF TODAY WERE SMALL ADVERTISERS WHEN THEY BEGAN. They knew that a penny saved is too often a dollar lost.

They had something to offer the public. They had faith in themselves. So they confidently told the public what they had to offer.

One of the biggest baking powder manufacturers on the continent, and a big advertiser, began in the back room of a small drug store in an Indiana town. This concern, now an enormous one, started advertising in the local paper to spread the demand.

Gradually the territory expanded as sales resulted. In time the whole state was being covered. Then other states. And finally, almost the world.

This is one of the instances cited by a writer in Printers' Ink Monthly, who has been able to tabulate the initial advertising appropriations of some of the concerns whose publicity is today known throughout the country.

A nationally-known toilet product was begun as a druggists' sideline, much like the baking powder. Someone advised the druggist to advertise in the local papers. He did. Results came. He extended his advertising and his selling grew in proportion. And never did he see the day when he wanted to stop his advertising.

A condensed milk company, whose first advertising appropriation was little more than $500, is today one of the great national advertisers.

This is the experience of advertising. Today's leaders began small because they had confidence in what they could furnish the public.

And in case after case it is found that these concerns have earned their advertising appropriations out of the increased business that followed.
