Disguising the Walks

Back yards, unfortunately, seldom are laid out with an eye to their ornamental possibilities and the planting problem often is made difficult by a walk of brick or cement exactly dividing the space in half, making it a puzzle to adapt it to any garden plan. But with a walk a fixture, it must be taken as it lies, and such a situation may be ameliorated into a scene of beauty by planting a border on each side of the walk, varying the plants in height and planting annuals of trailing habit to droop and trail over the hard edges of the walk, blurring its uncompromising outlines.

With a border on each side of the walk and a boundary planting of shrubs, annuals and perennials, a grass panel is left on either side of the walk, which may be left free or may have a small ornamental tree or shrub placed either in the center or at each end, the trees or shrubs matching in each panel.

For the border along the walk a space at least four feet wide will give a good effect. It is usually better to plant it to a variety of annuals of different height and style of growth than to bed it solidly to one variety. Along the edges of the walk, colonies of low-growing plants will be found most valuable to spread out over the edges of the cement or brick. Sweet alyssum, portulaca, verbena, dwarf nasturtiums, dwarf marigolds, Swan river daisies, ageratum and others offer fine material for this purpose. In planting opposing borders or parallel beds with edging plants the same plant colonies should be planted opposite each other or approximately opposite. The effect will be greatly improved by bearing this fact in mind.

Often edgings are planned for beds along a walk, one kind of plant on one side and another on the opposite. The plan seems alluring when contemplated, but it does not work out satisfactorily. The same plant or series of plants should be used to balance each other on both sides. The same principle holds true of the taller growing plants. They need not be exactly opposite to secure the effect, but nearly enough so to maintain balance.

Spade in the mulch of autumn leaves this spring. They will help to supply the lack of stable manure and give the garden a good supply of humus. If they are too dry to spade in, stack them up for a compost heap.

The new 20-day French breakfast radishes are really 20-day radishes. You'll have to eat 'em fast when they are 20 days old, as they don't last long in good quality. Make successive plantings a week or ten days apart.
