Waste Paper Inspection Guards Big Organization Against Loss Of Its Valuable Documents

Each evening in the great plant of the Prudential Home Office, in Newark, N. J., all the waste paper is baled and carried to a sorting room. There it is carefully opened and trained workers, all of them familiar with the various documents the company uses in its records, examine the refuse piece by piece, sitting on a raised platform under a powerful light. Not a scrap escapes this close scrutiny.

The institution of this waste paper searching system has had a still further and quite important influence. Since it is almost certain that carelessness will be discovered by the paper prospectors in the baling room, the clerks above stairs exercise greater vigilance and papers are not mistaid with the frequency that might be expected when the vast quantity of clerical work is considered.

Eternal vigilance is the watchword when the executives of great business organizations strive for efficiency.

It is conceivable even to one not particularly concerned with business methods that the loss of important documents is a menace against which the greatest caution should be exercised, and this is particularly true in the administration of an insurance company, with such a loss perhaps involving a costly and unwarranted delay in the adjustment of death claims or the payment of dividends.

When the Prudential Insurance Company of America was confronted with this problem it finally succeeded in reducing the lost-document hazard to an absolute minimum by adopting an almost elemental safeguard; the careful scrutiny of the day's waste paper after it had been collected by porters at night.
