

Better Food Protection With Less Ice

To keep foods wholesome where the temperature is hot is the problem which the ALASKA Refrigerator has successfully solved. By an improved system of building and insulating, perfected in more than 47 years of continuous experience, a low temperature can be maintained in the clean, white food chambers of the ALASKA, even in hottest weather or hottest rooms. It has been tested and approved by Good Housekeeping Institute.

WHY THE NEW ALASKA SAVES ICE
Pebbled cork insulation, the chief reason—ice economy is secured by isolating the ice in a heat proof place. In the ALASKA the food and ice chambers are made literally heat tight. Once the snug fitting doors are closed, the interior chambers become virtually sealed against the passage of heat.

But the feature of major importance in the saving of ice is PEBBLED CORK INSULATION. In these famous ALASKA Refrigerators, INNER WALLS OF PEBBLED CORK are interposed between the interior chambers and outside air. Experts know the value of cork in this respect. As evidence of this, the United States Government for years has specified cork in refrigerators it buys.

"CUBED CORK" is but one of the many insulating walls that stand between the outside heat and the cool interior of the Alaska. First comes the handsome hardwood outside case. Next are the layers of insulating sheathing papers, which are splendid non-conductors. Then comes the vital "pebbled cork" insulation, retained by wooden cleats that acts as a frame to hold the insulating material in place. Additional layers of insulating sheathing, the inside case and the metal lining complete the insulation.

Before you buy a refrigerator, compare their insulation with the ALASKA to arrive at their value.
