Climate and Soil

Vegetable growing success depends in great measure upon the condition of the soil in the garden as well as on the climate. Although weather forecasting as a science has advanced rapidly, it is impossible to guess far enough ahead to plan a vegetable garden on forecasts. But by preparation of the soil the rigors of climate, particularly the hot, parching dog days, may be ameliorated. This can be done by adding humus to the soil.

Start at once, saving all the vegetable vines that have served their usefulness and produced crops to dig into the soil. Particularly save pea and bean vines and stake out some obscure corner to stack them up as the time for crop picking comes around. If you have no further use for the soil where the early vegetables come out, sow it to clover or rye and spade it under this fall. This will help to make the soil cool and add humus.

Light, sandy soils need constant applications of vegetable matter. Some of the finest vegetable gardens are on "built up" soil, sand patches to which has been added yearly stable manure when it was available, followed in these latter days by all the refuse vegetable matter that could be accumulated, grass clippings, pulled weeds, potato peelings and old vegetable tops.

With this supply always in mind as the season advances, the compost heap will be under way right now with the early lawn clippings to be added to by pea vines and bean tops later on. But while this is waiting, keep the soil in the vegetable garden stirred. It will be a light task after the original hoeing to down the early crop of weeds. A stirring with a garden rake every few days will loosen the roots of newly sprouted weeds and keep them from getting a start.

The best time for this task is after a rain and as soon as the soil is dry enough to work. This is the time when weed seed jumps into life. From early summer until September, the main task is keeping the soil as cool as possible by cultivation and watering when needed to counteract the broiling sun. The hose with the hoe is a great cooling factor.
