FIVE FACTORS CONTROL MOST POTATO DISEASES

Five factors are essential to prevention and control of potato diseases in Oregon—crop rotation, seed selection, seed treatment, plant spraying, and good storage. These practices are outlined by the experiment station potato specialists, who also list the following as minor factors of control:

Kind of fertilizer used, cultural methods, checking of insects that spread disease, and use of irrigation water. The first five practices are most to be depended on. All of them must be considered if the grower is to produce potatoes of high yield and good quality, free of potato disease.

Results at the experiment station in Corvallis show that more than one of these methods are necessary, and that two or more—such as rotation and seed selection—must be employed on each lot successfully grown.

PASTURES TO BE STUDIED BY EXPERIMENT STATION

An extensive study of the pastures of Oregon, which will cover a period of several years, is being conducted by the Oregon Agricultural college station. N. C. Jamison, dairy extension specialist, has been temporarily transferred to the experiment station to take charge of the work. The work is to be started in Washington county. An effort is being made to get the farmers to keep an actual record of what the cows are producing on pasture.

"The development of more pasture for dairy cows in Oregon is an important problem, both from the standpoint of economy of production and nutrition," says P. M. Brandt, professor of dairy husbandry.
