ing of a new electrical civilization, which we can already foresee will be an different from that of steam as the age of steam was from the ages which went before it.

More Development. "What its development will be no man can yet forecast. But we are all familiar with electric light. We all know that work can be done hundreds of miles from the source of power by the transmission of electricity. Every housewife uses or wants to use the new electrical conveniences which are capable of taking from her shoulders the larger part of the drudgery of her daily tasks. We know already something at least of what electricity has in store.

"Human life in America is already largely dependent on the electric current. The time is clearly in sight when practically all people, at least in North America, can be supplied with electric servants at their work and in their homes—servants whose coming may become the greatest material blessing in human history or the greatest curse. "You may fairly ask how this great forward step in the conquest of man over nature can ever become a curse. It can become a curse only if the common good is forgotten in the hunger for exorbitant profits to the electric companies.

"In nearly every portion of the United States there is spreading out a vast network of electrical wires which will before long merge into a single great system or monopoly covering every portion of our country with electric service, and running into practically every home. Already these wires extend from, or will soon extend from, the Gulf of Mexico to Niagara Falls in a single interconnected system under a single control. The leaders of the electric industry do not hesitate to look forward to the time when a single unified electric system will cover, from border to border, the whole United States. The coming of such a system is already inevitable.

Single Monopoly. "A single system in America means a single monopoly, and a monopoly so powerful in wealth and political influence, covering so large a territory, and having so much to do with the success of every business and the comfort of every home, that nothing like it was ever known in the world before.

"This great monopoly is certain to come. Under proper regulation by the people it is necessary for the common welfare that it should come. Like the telephone, the supplying of electricity is a natural monopoly. The advantages and economies of a single control are so great, and the benefits to the people, if that monopoly is properly controlled by them are so vast, that it would be foolish to attempt to prevent it. Indeed this gigantic concentration of electrical ownership cannot be prevented. But it can be controlled.

"Just as every cloud has a silver lining, so every possible benefit has its corresponding abuse. We are already getting a foretaste in a small way of what such a monopoly as this might do to the people in the absence of adequate and effective public control.

Consumers Robbed. "The concentration of ownership of water power and steam plants which produce electricity, and of the transmission and distributing lines of wire over which it travels from the producer to the consumer, are all bringing about enormous economies which the companies are keeping almost entirely for themselves. There is little or no reduction from the war-time rates of electric service, and from these gigantic savings the consumer is getting little or nothing.

"Moreover, in addition to the large profits which the companies are distributing to their stockholders, they are realizing huge sums from the rise in price of their stocks. So enormous is the value of this rise in stocks to the companies that the Wall Street Journal computes the profits of only ten companies within eighteen months from this source alone at over $250,000,000. All this means that the companies are taking in more than they ought and the consumers are paying out more than they ought for electrical service.

"But steam is not the end of the story. Just as steam came to supplement or take the place of the power of human muscle, animal muscle, of wind and of falling water, so electricity is coming to supplement or take the place of human muscle. We are just at the begin-
