

History Made When Fire Chief Fails to Cuss Bad Alarm

For once in the history of Oregon fire departments, a fire chief did not cuss at a false alarm.

An alarm turned in shortly after 9 o'clock this morning sent the fire engine sirening up Fifth street.

The usual parade of sensation seekers, traffic officers and excited boys followed in the wake of the screeching fire truck.

The truck was pounding up Sixth street when the tragedy occurred. The gears stuck. Not a foot further up the hill could the fire truck proceed.

Firemen worked frantically. Chief Keith K. Ambrose directed the job and cursed long and silently between his teeth.

"Well, where's the fire?" one fireman asked.

And there wasn't any fire. It was a false alarm.
