Bungalow of Decided Western Style

House No. 612

Designed for American Face Brick Association

THE wide-spread gables, the dormer, the over-hanging eaves, the low, broad porch suggest the origin of this type in the Southwest where protection from the summer sun is always grateful...

The roof line is very pleasing with its low, rambling sweep. The porch in this case is made somewhat more secluded by the pleasing brick parapet which would lend itself to very artistic treatment...

The living room, occupying the entire front of the house, is accessible from the porch either on the front or side. The fine brick hearth is flanked by bookcases which suggest delightful winter evenings.

The dining room is entered through folding doors from the living room or through the hall, and opens to the kitchen through a pantry, with cupboards and also butler's sink, which, if desired, could be converted into a breakfast alcove...

The sleeping quarters—two bedrooms, a sleeping porch and the bath room—are secluded. The sleeping porch can do duty the year round for it is entirely glazed and has a good closet.

The basement is provided with laundry, heating apparatus, vegetable cellar, and proper storage space, but may be restricted in area at the option of the builder. The ceiling height is 8 feet 6 inches and the content 38,000 cubic feet.

Altogether this is an unusual house, both outside and inside, but above all it is decidedly a comfortable and convenient house to live in.

AMERICAN GIRL HEROINE OF BOOK ON NEW TURKEY

THE plans of Turkish reformers for a new era in the Near East are graphically portrayed in a new book, "Osman Pasha," just published by the Century company. The author, William Jourdan Rapp, is a newspaper man who has spent many years in Turkey, and whose recent articles in the New York Times have attracted widespread comment. In his book he tells, in drama form, a story of love, deep religious experience and great heroism, set against a background of present-day Turkey in the throes of a Renaissance, a Reformation and a Nationalist Revolution. His heroine is an American girl, the director of a Near East Relief orphanage in the interior of Anatolia.

Mr. Rapp transcribes with the fidelity of an annalist, the sympathy of an understanding friend, and the touch of an artist, a fascinating page out of contemporary history which Western Christendom has not even glimpsed hitherto.

A thousand estimates have been spread abroad of what the post-war ferment in humiliated and reviving Turkey meant and promised. This is a new account of it, different from all the rest and as thrilling as a prophetic vision.

The old Islamic contempt for the Christian infidel is here. So is the bitter repayment in hate with which the persecuted Armenian fills his full measure of retaliation, together with the drawing light of a brotherly and forging spirit mediated to both Christian and Moslem, not by the theology of either church or mosque but by the magic of the words of the Great Teacher. In the conservatism of entrenched religion pages of "Osman Pasha," the iron violently battles to protect the landmarks of bigotry. Here also are the envy of power and the aspiration after ideals which mingle in a new nation's impulses toward progress. All these the playwright has woven into a love story of unusual character and stark conviction.

Mr. Rapp's travels in the Near East, as newspaper correspondent, introduced him intimately to the highways, markets, forums, mosques and homes of the new Turkey. Of the story he tells of them, a leading Turkish historian says: "This picture of the historical background of the new Turkey and this presentation of the religious and philosophical trends in my country are not only skilfully done, but absolutely authentic. The play shows a knowledge and an understanding of Turkey and Islam which I have rarely found in a Westerner."

Dr. G. D. Andrews, chairman of the Federal Council's committee on drama, says of the play: "It is absorbingly interesting, and at the same time is a profound religious drama."

Like Ben Hur, it will provide a delightful evening for anyone interested in a thrilling story of a strange land and a strange faith, in religious or educational drama, in Turkey or Islam, in missionary work or Near East Relief activities, or in the Fundamentalist-Modernist controversy in the churches.
