At The LIBERTY

For the first time in the history of motion pictures, so far as is known, the character created by a great novelist may be seen in the flesh, just as she was when her personality inspired Gene Stratton-Porter to write her into a novel. Or rather, she may be seen on the screen—not in the flesh. For Gene Stratton Monroe, eleven year old grand-daughter of the famous author, is appearing in "The Keeper of the Bees" in the part which the late Mrs. Porter wrote around her—the "Little Scout." It was the hoydenish, tom-boy, lovable personality of little Miss Monroe which originally caused "The Keeper of the Bees" to be written; and literally millions of readers who followed this fascinating tale in McCall's magazine may now know just what the "Little Scout" looked like and compare her with the mental pictures they have drawn of her. "The Keeper of the Bees" at the Liberty Theatre tonight.

It is brilliantly cast, directed by Leo Meehan with the distinction which characterized "The Girl of the Limberlost"; and more than adheres faithfully to the spirit and letter of the original story.

At the PINE TREE

All the flashing humor, sentiment and pathos that live behind the scenes of Broadway theatrical life are vividly pictured in "The Song and Dance Man," which opened at the Pine Tree Theatre last night. Mr. Brenon has taken this original George M. Cohan play, dealing with the pathetic struggles and sacrifices of a typical vaudeville trouper, and transferred it to the screen with a smoothness that bespeaks a thorough familiarity with the variety stage.

He has captured all of the glamour, picturesqueness and color that are part and parcel of back-stage life, but he hasn't overlooked the poignantly dramatic, the hopeless and the tragic side of it. We are treated to the spectacle of a brilliant first-night audience, sitting in a magnificent theatre and watching a gorgeous musical comedy. Be we are also shown a rudely constructed, ill-smelling, honky-tonk theatre, with its rough-and-ready, liquor-drinking audience razzing a couple of youthful "hoofers."

Our admiration is won by the lavish surroundings of the Broadway stars, and our sympathies are aroused by the cheap, boarding-house atmosphere of the "small-timers." It is this ever-present light and shade, this constant, balancing contrast, that gives the photoplay its realistic flavor and unforgettable appeal.

why we call it—
"The desk that almost thinks"

A West-Made Desk is one of those inanimate things that somehow seem endowed with personality. Maybe you're telephoning and need some special data immediately. All you have to do is reach in the left-hand drawer of your West-Made, and there the information is, instantly available because it's filed. Perhaps you're dictating one of a series of letters. There in the lower right-hand drawer you'll find copies of all the previous correspondence on the subject. Your middle drawer keeps clips, pens, pencils, rubber bands and stationery, where you can find them quickly. There's a place for everything. A West-Made gives a busy man WHAT HE WANTS WHEN HE WANTS IT! After you have used a West-Made Desk, you'll agree that here at last is a "desk that almost thinks."
