

At The LIBERTY

Zane Grey's Western "Desert Gold" opened at the Liberty theater yesterday.

The picture was directed by Geo. Bolla, the man who made "The Vanishing American." And it is only fair to say that while "Desert Gold" is not done on the enormous scale employed in the former production, it can be favorably compared with out losing any of its own glamor.

A splendid cast has been given the director and scenarist, Lucine Hubbard, with which to work. Shirley Mason is a pleasing picture as Mordecai, the little Spanish senorita; and Nell Hamilton, the young cavalry soldier, contributes greatly to the action. Robert Frazer, who seems to have struck his stride, is admirable as the happy-go-lucky easterner; while William Powell makes a dastardly villain.

At the PINE TREE

Here, at last, is the 1926 version of that hoary fable of childhood, the story of Cinderella and the glass slipper. It reached the screen yesterday at the Pine Tree theater for a two days run under the neat title of "Ella Cladera."

Colleen Moore is the brightly animated star of this particular piece, and a better moving picture Cinderella of modern times than Colleen would be hard to imagine indeed. She is without doubt the ideal representation on the screen of youth and aspiration that struggles to free itself from the drab surroundings of poverty.

The 1926 version of the old Cinderella tale, as pictured on the therefore not such a dry document screen, is packed with laughs and as its matter-of-fact ancestor. In fact, it is the most consistent comedy vehicle in which Miss Moore has yet appeared.
