When the shadows ask "Gotta Match?"

It is after midnight—the street is deserted—your footfall sounds loud in the silence. Then, out of the black shadows, a gruff voice asks, "Gotta match?"

Not a pleasant experience, nor a likely one when Westinghouse plans your street-lighting. For the thoroughfare lighted with Westinghouse Holophane Bilux Refractors becomes one strip of uniform illumination.

Rays which otherwise cluster round the lamp-post or shoot toward the stars are sent where people walk—where traffic moves. Bilux light, five times normal intensity, is so evenly distributed that the street is as brightly lighted midway between the lamp-posts as below the lamps. There are no shadows—there is no glare.

Look at your own street-lamps tonight. Are they a help or a hindrance to questions the shadows ask?

Commenting on the Bilux installation along Sheridan Road, the Chicago Tribune said, editorially, "Coming out of normal street lighting into this section is almost like stepping from a darkened room into brilliant sunshine."
