Was the City Consulted?

Klamath Falls owns $300,000, plus $180,000 in interest in the Strahorn railroad.

Yet, when the new partners—the transcontinental railroads—acquired possession they cut the freight rates on the Strahorn railroad, thus destroying the earning power that it had and preventing any possibility of it ever being able to pay dividends on the $300,000 owned by this city.

Was the city consulted as one of the owners when that cut was made in freight rates?

No.

Should it have been consulted?
Suppose you individually owned a $300,000 interest in a corporation that was serving the public; suppose your partners also owned other corporations that would benefit by a reduction of rates in the corporation owned by you and them—what would you think if those partners met and decided to cut the rates on the corporation they owned with you jointly in order that the feeder service from that corporation would aid and increase the revenues of the corporations they owned and in which you were not interested?

That's the story of the Strahorn railroad rates. Analyze it any way you choose—there she is. You may ask why Klamath Falls did not step in and demand her rights.

The answer is the same old, old story: "General Public" is an unknown quantity when it comes to fighting battles before courts and commissions. What is everybody's business is nobody's business. The Strahorn matter has been muddled up and kicked around so long that many citizens have lost heart. City administrations have been buffeted by legal advice in the past to a point where no one knew where to begin the fight for the "General Public" of Klamath Falls.

Now, the matter is clearing up. If Klamath Falls' interests in the Strahorn road cannot be protected at a commission hearing, if she cannot get a court to listen to her plea of justice, there is one thing certain—she can try her case in the greatest court in the land—the court of public opinion. And that is exactly what she is going to do.

For the First Time

The much talked of state deficit has actually begun to appear in figures. It has been the political subject of many speeches. Campaigns have been based upon it. Governor Patterson fell for an income tax hurrah because he heard of the deficit and could see it peeking around the corner. Yet, all through the campaigns no one ever knew how much it was or would be. The state treasurer never was able to even guess within a mile of the facts, or rather his deputies were never able to, for a state treasurer does not have to worry much about the office. He has men to do the work.

Now, the deficit is coming on, so steel yourself and hold your breath. This state deficit is nothing more than confront business men often—just running at a loss. You have done it and so have we all. Now, the question before Oregon is how to change things about so expenses will be cut and the books made to balance. There is no cause for political hysteria for it is a plain business matter.

It is announced today by Miss May Clay Benton, editor. Miss Newton has one of the most responsible positions on the book. Besides editing the literary section she will write the copy for each section closer and opener.

Six full page campus views will be used in the opening section of the book and several new features will mark the various sections. Sixty-five pages will be devoted to university sports and recognition of all general and scholastic activities on the campus will be made.

At the Orpheus

Conrad Nagel's derivation from the field of romantic heroism for whimsical comedy has proved a decided success, if the big crowds at the Orpheus Theater each night to view his new vehicle "There You Are" is any criterion. Nagel, forsaking the romantic type of role, appears as whimsical comedian in a swift-moving story of a pair of sloppers pursued by parent and police, and how with tangled identities, a misplaced baby and other woes numerable and very comical.

MILAN GETS GATE

After managing the Memphis club for three years, Clyde Milan is not expected back as pilot next season.

Gortrude Bennett and other notable players are in the cast. Thrills are supplied by a mad chase of motor policeman after the sloppers, a wild leap from an apartment window when Nagel tries to escape a Nemesis in the form of a friendly collie, and other vivid "high spots."
