"The life of the motor is the life of the insulation." Other parts may be easily repaired and replaced, but the insulation is inaccessible. If it hardens and cracks, its life is ended. The motor must be completely rewound to be dependable.

Fairbanks-Morse insulation is painstakingly tested to secure elasticity. Built up layer upon layer—of tough, fibrous material dipped in a special plastic varnish—baked and redipped, then re-dipped and rebaked—it is rendered impervious to moisture, dust and ordinary exposure to corrosive gases.

The insulation is typical of the long-lived construction used in all Fairbanks-Morse motors and generators. They are built to give continuous, trouble-proof operation. We invite closest inspection and comparison. The many successful local installations give evidence of Fairbanks-Morse leadership
