Lincoln's Deathbed Doctor Still Lives; Keeps Curtain Drawn On His Memories

NEW YORK, April 21.—Sixty-three years now have passed since that night in April, 1865, when Abraham Lincoln died from the bullets of John Wilkes Booth.

Of persons who were friends of the great man, there are left but a handful. Few there are, even, who can boast they ever saw him. The last of his children, Robert Todd Lincoln, died in 1926.

But Dr. Charles A. Leale, the first doctor to reach Lincoln after he was wounded and who watched over the president until the end came, still lives in New York. He is 86. Though he has retired from active medical practice, he is in good health and serves on various hospital boards.

A Curtain Shields His Memories. Dr. Leale was 23, out of medical school for only a year, when he attended the dying Lincoln. He had joined the medical corps of the army, and was in charge of a ward for wounded officers in the U. S. General Hospital at Army Square, Washington, when the assassination of the president occurred.

Mrs. Lincoln placed Dr. Leale in charge of the treatment of the wounded president. But medical aid could do nothing save prolong Lincoln's life for a few short hours. It was the night of April 14 that he was shot; the next morning he was dead.

Of those historic days Dr. Leale has a store of priceless memories. But he dislikes to go back over them. He prefers to look to the future, and to think and talk of the happenings and projects of today that interest him. New achievement is better, he holds, than retrospection.

Robert Todd Lincoln, the emancipator's son, was like that. Through the years of his retirement he refused consistently to talk in reminiscent vein of his father. Near the end of his career he became virtually a recluse in the little New England town where he lived.

Dr. Leale resides in New York with his daughter. He has a son in New York who is a doctor, and another who is an attorney.

Won Prominence as Physician. When he was mustered out of the army in 1866, Dr. Leale went to the Klamath General hospital. This is the first child born to Mr. and Mrs. Miller.
