new way of obtaining altitude measurements by means of photographs and to get a record of temperature variations. This is how the aviators dressed: First they covered their bodies with grease, like channel swimmers. Then they donned a bathing suit. Over this went three suits of woolen underwear, then a woolen uniform and finally a leather flying suit with fur collar. Over their feet went three pairs of woolen socks, then shoes. They wore electrically heated, woolen-lined gloves and a wool-lined leather helmet. Electrically heated goggles over their eyes had a small hole drilled in each lens to enable the wearer to see if the rest of the lens became coated with frost. A wool-lined, leather mask covered their faces and a small tube projected at the mouth for breathing. When the plane reached the rarified air above 15,000 feet, the aviators attached mouth tubes from special oxygen bottles, and breathed from these. Extra oxygen also had to be supplied to the motor. This was done by means of a supercharger, or oxygen booster, developed by Dr. R. A. Moss in the Lynn, Mass., research laboratories of the General Electric Company.

OVERWORK CAUSES SUICIDE. LOS ANGELES, Jan. 18.—Detective Lieutenant Edw. Hamren, Los Angeles police officer, who recently suffered a nervous breakdown while working day and night on investigation of the Gordon Stewart "murder farm" case, was found dead in his home late today with a gas tube in his mouth. Police gave suicide as cause of death.

By ISRAEL KLEIN. Science Editor, NEA Service. We'd catch our death of cold if any of us tried to repeat the flight of two army aviators in Dayton, O., to a height of 37,854 feet. And if we escaped that death, we'd die of exhaustion half way up, even though sitting quietly in the cockpit. The reason is that in an hour and twenty minutes the plane which these army men took aloft went from a temperature of 71 degrees above zero to 76 below, and back again the next hour to 79 above. In addition, the change in atmosphere was so fast that at 15,000 feet the aviators had to get their air from oxygen tanks. The men who took this trip into the cold, rare atmosphere more than seven miles above the earth, were Captain St. Clair Street and Captain Albert W. Stevens, stationed at Wright Field, Dayton, O. They went up to test a new type of long range camera, to experiment with a
