Change Tires From Front to Rear, Advice

When a person stands on one foot until it gets tired, he can rest it by standing on the other one. When both feet get tired, he can sit down.

But the tires on an automobile can't do any of these things. They must hold up the car day in and day out, while it is standing, starting, stopping, going forward or backward at slow or breakneck speed.

When feet get tired a little rest will rejuvenate them. When tires get tired they are practically done. There is no rehabilitation.

Like feet, tires need a change—not necessarily having the weight removed, but from running in the same old position. They should be moved around on the car to accomplish this purpose.

When tires are run in the same position continuously they naturally develop a wear peculiar to that position, whereas if changed around, this wear is broken up and distributed more uniformly over the entire surface of the tire. Generally the right rear tire wears the fastest; the left rear next, then the right front. The left front wears slowest.

Miller service men recommend that customers religiously change their tires from front to rear and vice versa whenever the rear tires will naturally be worn out first if left in that position.
