Cruisers Form Crux of British and American Problem at Arms Parley

EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the second of a series of four stories by Milton Bronner, European manager for NEA Service, on the important problems confronting the naval disarmament conference at London. In subsequent articles, Bronner will discuss the Japanese and the French and Italian positions.

BY MILTON BRONNER

NEA Service Writer
LONDON, Jan. 22—Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald probably will have a harder task to make the British Parliament follow him in whatever steps the London Naval Conference may agree upon than President Hoover will have with the American Congress. There are plenty of American naval die-hards, but they are not as numerous nor as well entrenched as those in Great Britain.

The difference is accentuated also by the matter of geography. American possessions are mainly continental and far-flung empire. Britain has a hard-fung empire, with colonial possessions on every continent and in every sea. For generations it was an axiom of British naval policy that her men-of-war should be equal to those of the other two strongest naval powers. Britain now has recognized the principle of parity with the United States. Just what form this parity is to take is yet to be determined.

Here, as in America, it is recognized that the crux of the situation is between the two countries in the matter of cruisers. Tentatively the figures agreed upon are 339,000 tons for Great Britain and 315,000 tons for the United States. The generosity of this gesture on the part of President Hoover is fully recognized. The one question that remains is how this tonnage shall be divided. Great Britain would be content with 15 cruisers of 10,000 tons each, carrying eight-inch guns, and the other 25 being about 6500 tons and carrying six-inch guns. The United States wants 21 cruisers of 10,000 tons each, carrying eight-inch guns and 15 cruisers of 7000 tons, carrying six-inch guns. Britain hopes to persuade America to accept 18 cruisers of 10,000 tons each, taking in compensation four smaller cruisers carrying six-inch guns. An alternative proposal is that if we insist upon 21 of these big cruisers, three of them should carry six instead of eight-inch guns.

One thing remains to be said: the hope has been expressed in some quarters that if a five-power agreement cannot be reached in London, a three-power agreement shall be drafted and signed between the United States, Great Britain and Japan. As things look now, this would be impossible for Great Britain. If the French and the Italians, or the French alone, buck an agreement to limit cruisers and submarines, the whole aspect of things will be changed. The United States and Japan, far away from Europe, could look with a certain equanimity upon the building of a big French or Italian fleet of cruisers and submarines. Her main lines of marine communication is through the Mediterranean en route to Egypt, Palestine, India, Malaysia and Australia and New Zealand. Any unrestricted growth of French or Italian fleets of cruisers and submarines might some day be a serious American concern.

menace to British shipping. For every big lot of submarines France or Italy might build, England would feel she needed at least three British cruisers or destroyers per alien submarine. Nor could she view calmly the possibility of big submarine fleets being forth from English Channel ports, if she ever had a difference with France.

The attitude of England and the British Empire may, therefore, be summed up with a big "IT": in the main, her policy on naval disarmament promises to march with our own—if the other powers can be brought to agree.
