Red Man Misunderstood?—
Most misunderstood of all men is the American Indian, declared C. J. Cornelson of Pendleton, speaking before the Rotary club of Portland at its weekly luncheon meeting at the Benson hotel yesterday.
The Indian was not lazy, he maintained. The Indian was a fighting man, and had to keep himself ready for battle at all times that was the reason he didn't hoe corn.
And it is not true that the Indian has made no contributions to civilization, the speaker said, for he has the original producer of corn, tobacco, tomatoes, melons, squash, artichokes and other foods.—Oregonian.

Results of the classified advertising campaign now being conducted throughout the country by the Oregon state chamber of commerce are revealed in the January report, which shows 79 families located in various parts of Oregon, as compared with 26 new families locating in the state in January, 1929. Investments by settlers increased from $72,850 in January, 1929, to $225,000 last month. Oregon acreage purchased by new settlers increased from 418 acres in January, 1929, to 14,485 in January of this year.
W. G. Ide, manager of the state chamber, reported 206 families announced by letter last month that they had decided to locate in Oregon, as compared with 86 such letters received in January of last year. The prospective settlers indicated their contemplated investment would aggregate $753,800. Mr. Ide reported that the Los Angeles office of the state chamber is sending many prospective settlers and investors to Oregon. Two large sales recently were engineered through the Los Angeles office, Mr. Ide said, one involving a 160-acre tract in Tillamook county and another a 1200-acre place in Malheur county.
An average of 260 letters of inquiry were received each day during January, Mr. Ide reported, and on one day 298 inquiries were received, establishing a record for land settlement work of the state chamber.—Oregonian.

Elk of Umatilla County Graze Washington Fields

Farmers of Washington whose lands border Umatilla county are registering complaints against the destructiveness of elk that are the property of Oregon, and, according to Harold Clifford, state game warden, unless something is done the irate land owners may take the law into their own hands.

May Mean Open Season—
"I am convinced that within a short time it will be necessary to make a short open season on the elk in this particular section of the state," says Mr. Clifford. "There is no question but what the complaints of the Washington farmers are entirely justified. Elk wander into their lands and, because they are quite tame, are difficult to drive away. They are almost like domestic animals and show no fear of man and once in the field of a farmer their appetites do great damage. An open season which would regulate the number of licenses issued and limit the number of elk to be slain would perhaps remedy the situation."

Bag Many Cougars—
A total of 25 cougar were killed in Oregon during January, according to the records of the state game commission. All were killed in the sections of the state that are the haunts of deer. One wolf was bagged by a Douglas county hunter.

Advocates Heating Ponds—
Heated steam pipes that would keep the water in the ponds of the Fall River hatchery at an even temperature all year, is being advocated by Matt Ryckman, superintendent of Hatcheries for the state game commission.

Fish feed more and consequently grow larger in water that is around fifty degrees in temperature, according to Mr. Ryckman. At the Oak Springs hatchery fish grow larger than in any other breeding place and this is due to warm springs that feed into the ponds.

Game Birds Survive—
While there were reports of the death of some quail in certain sections of Oregon during the recent cold weather the loss of life of other game birds and game animals was not great, according to officials of the state game commission. In Eastern Oregon cold weather was not unusual and the birds and animals suffered no more than during a normal season.

"Pullman" At Work—
With the weather breaking the "fish Pullman" of the state game commission will leave its garage and go to work planting fish in the coast streams. The work will be carried on throughout the winter, the weather permitting as there are millions of fish in the various hatcheries awaiting liberation.
