

PIONEER DAYS

And Its Glorious Present

All honor to the men and women who left their homes in the east and blazed the trail to the Pacific coast in 1849. To them no thought of high esteem can be too great; upon them the destiny of this west coast hinged.

Attracted by the gold of the west, those '49ers trudged wearily onward. Death thinned their ranks—a few turned back—but the foundation stock of this Pacific coast stood the rigors of climate, the toll of the desert, the hardship of hunger, but finally landed in this great land, set their stakes and beckoned to the world to follow.

As the Klamath Falls Legion and Elks orders combine this year of 1930 to celebrate the crossing of the plains in 1849; as they attune their hearts and their minds to those old days when men wore full beards and women wore the ruffled dresses, let us not take this event entirely as one of fun and frolic. True, good cheer should mark such a celebration, but pause for a brief moment occasionally and think what those sturdy men and women gave to the world. Think of how they braved everything to come to the land which has proved to be the greatest home country on the face of the earth.

It is the land that first produced the gold, then the grain, then the livestock, and soon cities were built, railroads constructed and today it is an empire within itself.

In the center of this domain nestles the city of Klamath Falls, Oregon—a city with a history and a city with a future. It is here the people will congregate from hundreds of miles to join in the celebration of the early pioneer days. Here in the last frontier city of the Pacific slope will joy be unconfined, with sufficient meditation and reflection given to leaven the loaf of pleasure with the background of historical seriousness. The town is open to the world. The password of western hospitality is on the lips of all. Let the memories of those pioneers be revered and let the gleaming light of the bright future of Klamath and the entire coast glint from hill to hill.

The soldiers of the late war are taking part in this great demonstration. Likewise the Elks lodge, noted for its hospitality, has joined the Legion in this cheerful event. What combination could be cast that would better typify the spirit of America?

For the three days while Klamath Falls is playing host to the thousands of guests, the word "WELCOME" rings from every housetop. It resounds in every street. It will be seen in every face. Have a good time, for the country that the Forty-niners discovered has come into its own.
