Changes In Homes Is Forecast

It is on them, anyway. The dust, dirt and noise from the street, the automobiles racing by, the thud of heavy trucks, makes the front of the house a far from pleasant place in which to linger. Thus, there is a tendency already to turn houses around on their lots and place the living rooms at the back and the kitchen on the street. The living room then can open onto the back yard, which can be made attractive with flowers and landscaping, and a far greater degree of quiet can be enjoyed by the home dweller.

"Walls and partitions will be thinner and thinner, without destroying the durability of the house. There is already a trend in this direction due to the improvement of insulating materials and the use of new wall materials. Centuries ago, when a man built a house, he usually built it of stone with walls a foot and a half thick. He did this to keep his house as warm and dry as possible during bad weather. His construction kept his house cool in summer.

Two-Inch Walls

"Now insulating materials of infinitesimal thickness will do this; and new building materials are providing durable walls that need be only a few inches thick. Most walls are eight inches, under present building codes, but these codes will be revised in the future to permit four and, perhaps, even two-inch walls and partitions.

"Stop and think of the saving in cost of materials in such a change. In addition, there will be saving in usable space that will surprise the builder when he figures it out. Suppose you usually make walls eight inches, and you find that you can make them four inches and achieve the same structural result. You could save space enough to make a bathroom or a small bedroom. The further development of such wall materials as steel and other products, will actually cut down on the cost, and add floor space to the average home.

Nice for Summer

"Heat is required to make ice and to provide cooling systems. The house of the future will have a plant which will heat it, make its ice, and wash and cool its air when necessary.

"The future home dweller will not have to go to summer resorts in the hot weather. The cooling system, that I am sure will come, will not only regulate the temperature throughout the house, but will make it possible to regulate the temperature in an individual room.

"Picture the home-owner of the future, coming home on a scizzling hot evening and finding cool breezes playing through his bedroom.

"I do not think the public will accept some of the ultra-modern home ideas and designs that we have seen in the magazines recently. Our members get to know the public mind on this subject pretty well, and we find that the rank and file of people have very definite and deep-rooted ideas of what homes should be.

"They like improvements if they can't see them, but if you change the house too radically, they won't like it. They won't accept the circular rooms an architect prescribes, and they won't sleep in ship's cabin bunks that another architect forecasts.

Men Hunting With Dogs Pay Heavily

PORTLAND, Oct. 20 (AP)—Charged with hunting deer with dogs, Roy C. Moser of Forest Grove was fined $150, and F. W. McCullough and W. F. McCullough of Scoggin's valley, were today under bail of $500 each. They were arrested by deputy game wardens who trailed them into the headwaters of the Trask river in Washington county.

Moser pleaded guilty. The others entered a plea of not guilty.
