

LEGION PLAYS BASEBALL TEAM

Plans for a Junior American Legion baseball team to enter the state and national tournament were completed last night at a meeting of the American Legion.

All boys in the city who will not be over 17 years of age on July 1 are eligible to enter the play which will start soon.

O'Brien in Charge
V. O'Brien of the Associated Old company is in charge in Klamath Falls and is assisted by Frank Snyder of Snyder's Auto Repair Shop, and W. V. Meade of the Big Basin Lumber company. Other Legionnaires will be appointed in cities in the county. Commander Douglas Puckett announced last night.

Klamath Falls will be divided into three sections for the play. The championship Klamath county team will meet the winner of another section some time in July. Last year the Silverton, Oregon team competed in the national finals, being beaten by only one club.

Highway Safety
Tonight a committee from the Legion composed of Chet Kerlake, Kenos, chairman; Perry O. DeLap and Earl Templar, both of Klamath Falls, will meet with state traffic officers and the chief of police of the city to plan a campaign for highway safety.

It is pointed out that more were killed in traffic accidents in the United States in the past 18 months than Americans were killed during the World War.

Picnic Tour Sunday
Sunday members of the Legion and auxiliary will take a tour and picnic through the Tule lake country in connection with the collection of Indian relics and rocks to be used in the erection of a Legion memorial fountain in Moore park. Lunches will be taken by those on the tour. Cars will leave the Legion hall at 8 a. m. and those without transportation will be provided with seats in cars.

O. D. Matthews is in charge of the construction of the fountain which is to be partly composed of Indian relics and stones which will be gathered during the tour of the Tule lake country on Sunday.

The Legion Auxiliary also held a regular meeting last night.

Outside Men Will Secure Homesteads

Leslie R. Jensen, Coos Bay, and Arthur E. McClymonds, former superintendent of the experiment station at Aberdeen, Idaho, both ex-service men, are the other two men to secure homesteads in the Tule Lake area this spring, it was announced yesterday by B. E. Hayden, superintendent of the Klamath reclamation project.

Both men have been notified that they are among the successful applicants for homesteads in the fertile "bread basket" of the Klamath empire.
Announcement of 22 successful applicants was made recently, but the names of Jensen and McClymonds were withheld pending lapation of necessary time under federal rules.

Statistics Show Births In Lead

A check of the births and deaths in Klamath county for the past three years reveal only half as many deaths as there were births in the county during that period of time.
Following is a table of the vital statistics:

Deaths—1928, 225; 1929, 265; 1930, 285.

MAD MARRIAGE

by LAURA LOU BROOKMAN Author of "HEART HUNGRY," etc.

CHAPTER XXXI.
"I'll go in with you," Jim said, when they reached the house. "I've got a book of Harrison's I meant to return a week ago."

He left the roadster in the driveway. They entered and Gypsy had taken off her hat and was fluffing out her hair before the mirror when Matilda appeared.

"Say, Miss Wallace," she said, "there's something wrong with that dog."

"What's the matter with Pat?" "I don't know. Only he certainly does act sick. He's lying out back of the house making queer noises and trying to move as though something hurt him. I never saw him act this way before."

Jim did not wait to listen. He hurried through the house with Gypsy and the cook close behind him. Beneath a tree a few yards from the kitchen door was the huddled little black and white figure. Pat's head was turned away from them.

The man dropped to his knees. "What's the matter, old fellow?" he asked.

An agonized moan shook the terrier convulsively. It must have hurt him, for he cried out with a succession of high-pitched whimpers. The little head turned slightly. Two tortured dog eyes looked into Jim's.

"He's been poisoned!" Jim Wallace exclaimed. "That's what's happened! Gypsy, call Loomis and tell him to come over here. Tell him to hurry."

The girl ran into the house. Gently Jim lifted the little dog, but in spite of his care Pat's cries were plaintive. He writhed and with each movement the moaning continued. It was the wall of agony and weakness, almost like a crying child.

"Steady now, old fellow! Easy there," Jim murmured as he bore the terrier into the house. "Does it hurt so badly? We're going to make you well, Pat, old boy! You're going to be all right."

He laid the little burden down on the davenport in the living room. Pat's eyes were closed. A quiver ran through his body. The dog tried to squirm to another position, gave up the effort.

"How long has he been like this?" Jim demanded of Matilda. "I don't know, sir. It was about 15 minutes ago I noticed him. I went out in the yard to call Sam and I saw the dog lying so kind of limp. He was making those queer noises just like he is now. Sam came and looked at him, too, and said he didn't know what was the matter."

Gypsy reappeared. "Dr. Loomis is coming right away," she said. "Oh, Pat, darling, I can't bear to hear you cry! This is dreadful, Jim. Isn't there something we can do?"

Jim was eyeing the terrier. Pat had twisted around so that he was lying with his head between his paws. The eyes that had been so bright were dull. Pat raised them pleadingly to his master. Gypsy noticed that the bit of tail which invariably wagged in gay greeting was still.

She slipped down to the floor and stroked the dog's head. "Don't do it," Jim cautioned. "I think it's better to let him alone. I wish I knew how long ago he got the poison. Did Loomis say he was starting at once? Lord, I'd like to do something but I don't know what to try."

"Yes; he said he'd hurry. I told Dr. Loomis we thought it was poison. Oh, why doesn't he come? Why doesn't he come?"

"If I could get hold of the one who did this," Jim threatened, darkly, "I'd pay him for it. I'd like to have my hands on him for just about five minutes!"

The shrill ring of the doorbell cut the air. Matilda answered and a moment later a small man in a dark suit entered. He carried a medical case.

"How do you do, Mr. Wallace. Understand you have a sick dog. Where'll I find him?"

"Here," Jim said, pointing to the davenport. "I guess it's poison, Doc. He seems pretty bad."

The proprietor of the pet hospital approached Pat. "I see," he said speculatively. He knelt beside the terrier and studied his eyes. A moment later he had the medical case open on the table and was preparing a mixture. Jim held the dog's rigid body while the veterinarian forced the dose down the animal's throat. There were writhings and wriggings and more cries of pain. For nearly an hour Dr. Loomis stayed watching the dog, trying to relieve his torture.

"I can't promise anything," the veterinarian said, as he finally turned to leave. "It's impossible to be sure how much of the poison the dog swallowed. If he didn't get too much the medicine ought to do the work. You can feel encouraged that he's stayed alive this long. Most poisons work fast. Well, I'll say good day now. Give me a ring about 7 o'clock, will you?"

"You're sure there's nothing more you can do?" Gypsy asked, anxiously.
"Nothing to do now but wait," Loomis said, shaking his head. "The animal has a chance, all right. If there's any decided change, I'd like to hear about it." He went then, Gypsy and Jim lingered beside the sick dog. Presently Jim left the telephone that he would not return to the office that afternoon.

"I don't like the way his eyes look," Jim complained, leaning forward and staring at Pat intently.

"Dr. Loomis said he had a chance!"

Later Gypsy stole out of the room and left the two together. Dusk came and Jim did not turn on the light in the living room. When dinner was served he refused to leave the dog. Gypsy sat by Pat while her husband snatched a hasty meal. Then she went to the table and Jim took up his watch again. At 7 o'clock he insisted Loomis should return and have a look at the terrier.

The report from the second visit was more hopeful. The veterinarian said he believed Pat would pull through. He gave instructions for the dog's care next day. Again if anything unusual transpired he asked to be notified.

"My land—the way Mr. Wallace acts you'd think it was a person that was sick!" Matilda declared to Gypsy. They were in the kitchen.

"But he's had Pat ever since the dog was a tiny puppy," the girl said. "Besides, Pat's such a good dog! It nearly breaks my heart to see him lie there suffering and so helpless. It's so much worse because he can't tell us how he feels!"

"Pitiful, all right," Matilda agreed, half-heartedly, "but I never see such goings-on over a sick dog before."

There were to be more "goings-on." All through the night Jim and Gypsy alternated in constant vigil over Pat. Jim stayed with the dog until 1 o'clock. Then Gypsy appeared, wrapped in her yellow bathrobe, and insisted that he should get some sleep. At 4 o'clock Jim was back again, sleepy-eyed but firm in his determination to take the girl's place. Little Pat seemed quieter. He was doing.

By morning they knew the dog would recover. Pat even rallied to the extent of beating a feeble rat-a-tat-tat with his tail when Jim looked in on him before going to the office. There was great rejoicing in the household.

Two days more and the terrier seemed to be romping as gaily as ever. His antics, however, were governed by a new routine. There was no more trotting off by himself throughout the neighborhood when he chose. Pat remained in doors or in a square wire runway at the back of the house except when Gypsy took him with her on his leash.

They went shopping each morning together and for long walks in the afternoon. Gypsy had discovered the country-side runway rounding Forest City was glorious in May. Lilac blossoms had come and faded, and now plum and apple trees were loaded with snowy fragrance. Whichever way she walked she sniffed their bon-

At The Vox

Modern women are generally quite independent, working alongside the men in most business and social capacities, earning their own livings, buying their own clothes and supporting themselves in many instances even after their marriages.

That this is not true of the mountain women who dwell on stoney little farms in the valleys between the towering mountains of West Virginia, is seen in "Tol'able David," the film, adapted by Columbia Pictures from Joseph Hergesheimer's famous story, and now showing at the New Vox theatre.

In this picture, when heart failure takes away the head of the house, and an accident incapacitates the eldest son, there is no one left to work the barren fields and so eke out even that poor existence which the family had previously enjoyed. They must move into town to a poor shack, giving up the farm on which they have lived all their lives.

For women folk of the mountains to work the farm themselves, is out of the question. Cooking, caring for the house, feeding hungry mouths, milking the cows, feeding the little livestock they possess—this is their work. Beyond this, to till the fields also, would be more than their strength would allow. They are dependent on their men to do the work which brings them food, just as those earlier Americans, the Indians, were dependent upon their warriors to go out and bring down the deer, wild fowl and other food.

"Tol'able David" boasts an excellent cast. Richard Cromwell, a newcomer to the screen, is "David." Supporting him are many well known stage and screen troopers, including Joan Peers, Henry B. Walthall, Helen Ware, Noah Beery and George Duryea. John B. Blystone directed.

The equipment to be demonstrated includes the latest improved nozzles, spray guns and knapsack sprayers and dusters. Sometimes it is advantageous to use the dust instead of the liquid. Both methods of application will be fully demonstrated and a detailed discussion of weed control and eradication will be given.

NOTED POET DIES
STOCKHOLM, Sweden, April 8. (AP)—Dr. Erik Axel Karlfeldt permanent secretary of the Swedish Academy which annually awards the Nobel prize in literature, died last night from bronchitis and heart weakness. He was long regarded as one of Sweden's most gifted poets. He was elected one of the eighteen members of the academy in 1904 and since 1907 had been a member of the Nobel committee.

President Fred Houston presided yesterday at the regular meeting of the Lions club at the Pelican Grille, which was turned over to a discussion of proposed amendments to the by-laws of the local club.

Copies of the proposed changes were before members for discussion and the amended laws were adopted at the meeting to guide the club in its program throughout the coming year.

The changes were made to bring the club up to date and in consonance with the larger organization.

ANOTHER EXAMPLE OF FORD VALUE

Bright, enduring RUSTLESS STEEL is used for many exposed bright metal parts of the Ford

WHEN YOU BUY a Ford you buy enduring beauty. The body finish is made to last for the life of the car and practically all exposed bright metal parts except the bumpers are made of enduring Rustless Steel.

This Rustless Steel has great tensile strength. It is the same bright metal all the way through. A salt test equivalent to forty years' service under the severest weather conditions failed to have any effect on its brilliance. It never requires polishing. All you do is wipe it with a damp cloth, as you do your windshield.

This is just one of many features that show the substantial worth of the Ford. In speed, comfort, safety, economy and long life—in the richness of its finish and upholstery—it brings you everything you want or need in a motor car at an unusually low price.
