

Mysterious Naval Officer Added to Puzzle of Plane Crash in Catskill Mountains

LIBERTY, N. Y., June 14, (UP)—A mysterious naval officer, whose papers and chemicals carried by William Bader, Buffalo chemical engineer was added on Wednesday to the puzzle of the American Airways liner's crash in the Catskills.

After a two-hour conference with Coroner Victor Bourke, the officer sped away in a Ford sedan bearing navy plates without disclosing his identity. Bourke said the visitor was from "U. S. intelligence" but declared he had pledged secrecy regarding details.

Coroner Sworn to Secrecy

Bourke had indicated he would retain custody of the papers and chemicals in belief they might answer the question of whether Bader's chemical exploded, causing the plane to crash on Seven-gap mountain killing all seven occupants. The chemist carried two bags aboard the plane. The papers and chemicals taken by the navy officer were in one. Only shreds of brown leather and pulverized bottle glass were left of the other.

The coroner, who previously had referred to the papers as "secret navy explosives formulae," asserted he had been "sworn to secrecy" and that he had surrendered his evidence on order of "an authority which superceded my state right."

Arrival of the intelligence officer, after the navy department at Washington had denied it was investigating the crash, was dramatic. Newspapers at liberty saw the car bearing blue plates inscribed "U. S. N." speed through main street. They gave chase and overtook it at Livingston Manor, where it stood before the home of Corner Burke.

Two men in civilian clothes were in the car. One threatened violence to any reporter who "lays hands on this car."
