Stock Market Quotations

NEW YORK, Dec. 7. (AP)—Stocks rallied today under the leadership of merchandising and metal issues.

A number of new highs for the past several years were recorded, with gains ranging from fractions to two or more points. Trading, quiet at the start, picked up speed in the final hour. The close was firm. Transfers approximated 1,200,000 shares.

As a market influence the foreign situation appeared to be about a stand-off, but the tension of the past several days apparently was not so pronounced.

Speculative and investment sentiment evidently turned to the bullish side of equities as the domestic economic picture grew brighter.

A number of low-priced shares were again lively performers for a time at small advances. Scattered "blue chips" came into prominence at the tail-end of the proceedings.

Shares of Coca-Cola got up around seven points and lesser advances were registered by Sears, Roebuck, Montgomery Ward, McCrory Stores, Remington Rand, Eastman Kodak, International Nickel, Anaconda, Cerro de Pasco, American Smelting, Howe Sound, Case, American Can, Adams Express, Chrysler, General Motors, Young Spring and Wire, U. S. Steel, Bethlehem, American Telephone, Western Union, Consolidated Gas, North American, Postal Telegraph, N. Y. Central, Pennsylvania, Douglas Aircraft and United Aircraft.

Brokers reported an increase in cash purchases, with an expansion of orders from the west. Signs of a further sharp upturn in retail sales throughout the country aided equities in this category.

POULTRY REQUIRE GOOD VENTILATION

Because hens and other fowls require, per pound of body weight, about five times as much fresh air as human beings and more than twice as much as horses and cows proper ventilation is naturally one of the most important of the many points to be considered in building a comfortable and convenient poultry house.

To provide this necessary ventilation, special type ventilators are often needed, because the ordinary natural draft type commonly used for barns depend upon a difference in temperature between the inside and outside of the building. In poultry houses, especially in mild climates, this difference is often not great enough.

Instructions for building and installing adequate ventilators, together with detailed discussions, descriptions and drawings of poultry houses and housing equipment are contained in a 47-page booklet entitled, "Poultry Housing," recently issued by the Oregon State college experiment station. The authors are F. L.

Known, professor poultry husbandry; H. E. Cooby, extension specialist; H. E. Price, agricultural engineer.

Fowls can be economically kept in any type of house which, in addition to assuring the comfort of the birds, renders their efficient care possible, say the authors of the new bulletin. Factors that affect the comfort of the birds, and therefore their health, include temperature, wind, moisture, location, facing, ventilation, floor space and roosting space—all of which are discussed in the bulletin under the heading of "Poultry Housing Principles."

Detailed plans and specifications and bills of materials are included in the bulletin for the 25-hen house and for a 500-hen unit of the well-known O. S. C. commercial laying house. Houses of the latter type have been in use by the state college and many poultrymen throughout the state for the past 12 years. As the result of hot experience and experimental test, modifications have been made in the recommended plans for this house, and the plans in the new bulletin, while essentially the same, contain some new features, such as increased width, that are believed to be improvements.

Many types of poultry housing equipment are discussed in the new publication and plans for their construction given.

SEED PRODUCTION OPPORTUNITY SEEN

The long-sought Utopia for farmers—a ready market eager for products—is awaiting certain Oregon growers and Oregon communities that are ready to grasp the opportunity, says E. R. Jackson, extension agronomist at Oregon State college. This opportunity is in seed production, an industry which already brings more than two million dollars a year to the state, but which still has plenty of chance for expansion along certain lines, he says.

The unusual combination of favorable circumstances which may never be seen again includes the mid-western drought which killed millions of acres of pasture and hay meadows, and delayed reseeding of these; the crop reduction programs which encourage seedling of legumes and grasses on millions of acres; the land purchase program with the return of sub-marginal land to grazing and the soil conservation program which has opened up additional markets for certain grasses and legumes.

The two foremost opportunities exist for raising created wheat grass and Ladak alfalfa seed, says Jackson. Both of these are eastern Oregon crops. The price of created wheat grass is still very high but is bound to come down when planted acreages are in full production, though a steady market for years to come is in sight. Dry land at rather high elevation: is suitable for Ladak alfalfa seed production.

The price of this crop last year was 50 to 70 cents a pound, while common alfalfa sold below 20 cents.

For western Oregon Jackson expects all kinds of clover seed to have a relatively better price for the next few years than grains, although many factors may alter this situation. Alfalfa vetch seed, on the other hand, is grown on enough land to handle prospective needs.

Oregon has a virtual monopoly at present on hairy and Hungarian vetch and Italian rye grass, Ladino clover, Tennessee Anthracnose Resistant red clover, certified English rye grass and bent grass. The state supplies a large share of the Reed canary grass seed, Austrian winter peas and Ladak alfalfa.

Seed production requires a higher type of farmer than general farming, but it has its advantages for those willing to devote a part of their intelligence to the business, says Jackson. County farm outlook conferences this winter will probably give much attention to this industry.
