Plenty of Time

ONE of the arguments offered against the September primary measure, to be on the ballot January 31, is that it won't give long enough time between the primary and general elections for an adequate campaign.
 This is given as a strong objection to the proposed act. An examination of the facts makes it look extremely weak.
 Under the proposed law, there will be 62 days between the primary and general election. Candidates running in the primary must file their candidacies with the secretary of state 45 days before the primary.
 That indicates a campaign of well over 90 days. That ought to be long enough for anybody, and it certainly is long enough for the public on which the candidates put all their pressure during a campaign period.
 But if that isn't enough, there will be nothing to prevent a candidate from starting as long before the primary filing period as he sees fit. If he thinks its good psychology to hammer the voters from New Year's to November, he can do it, provided, of course, that he wins the primary nomination on the way.
 The smartest politicians will tell you that its best not to run too long a campaign. Many a vote battle has been lost because the campaign had passed the peak and was running downhill by election day. The three months and more between primary filing period and the general election, as provided in the new law, will be found satisfactory for most candidates. Those who think they can't do it in that time can take longer if they want to.

Lindbergh Cowardly?

THERE has appeared, in some newspapers, comment on the Lindbergh departure, to the effect that the flying colonel's flight to England was an act of cowardice. That was not the general press reaction, but it was said in a number of places.
 Colonel Lindbergh and his wife have been through supreme tragedy. They spent terrible weeks searching for their stolen first child, and finally received a broken dead little body.
 Now they have another child. Threats have been made against him. Photographers for yellow newspapers virtually executed a highway hold-up to get pictures of little Jon. Continuance of this sort of thing has made it almost impossible for the child to grow up under normal circumstances here.
 Who will question the colonel's act in taking his family to a place where he believes conditions will be better, and the second child will be safer from kidnapers and curiosity seekers? Considering Lindbergh's experiences, its a piece of rank injustice to call it cowardice.
 It's true that the Lindbergh departure hasn't made pleasant news for Americans. But its significance may have a good effect.

Enforcement problems are receiving greater attention from the Oregon State Liquor Control commission, now that its other departments are functioning properly and the whole program has been generally accepted as the best method for handling liquor in Oregon. If the system is to remain in good standing, the rules and regulations must be enforced. For one thing, that must be done to be fair to the decent licensees who seek to run orderly places and obey the mandates of the commission and the law.

The magazine Time at the end of each year announces its selection of the "Man of the Year." This time it chose Haile Selassie, Ethiopia's remarkable king. "Little Charlie," as the press correspondents call him, functioned smoothly and cleverly in winning the world's sympathy for his country. He was, to say the least, the No. 1 underdog of 1935. Under the circumstances, there is considerable justification for classifying the No. 1 underdog as the No. 1 man of the year.

The moisture situation in the Klamath country has been much improved. Snow is piling up in the mountains, promising a good run-off next spring and summer. Down in the basin, however, the weather has been a little too sloppy for comfort—a little too much like the Willamette valley. That kind of weather is bad on the country roads.

Some indignation has been expressed by men mentioned in the news columns as possible candidates for certain offices at the coming elections. No harm was meant.

Adolph's Observations

ALL you have to do is to watch the average fellow a little close and you will come to the conclusion that most of us are hughouse.
 Today I was in a little shoe shop and the proprietor had gotten a request for something he had to send away for. He wrote his order with pencil on an old piece of paper and I tried to read it, when he had his back turned, but it was no use. You just couldn't make out what it was all about.
 He called up the postmaster and asked whether it could go on the morning train if he got it right over, and I guess they told him yes if he would hurry up. As I was leaving he pushed his letter into an envelope, stuck on a stamp and busted over towards the postoffice.
 A few minutes later I saw the old duffer put his missive

Rest of Capitol Grant Diverted

SALEM, Ore., Jan. 6. (UP)—The $50,000 balance of PWA's original grant for the new state-house has been allocated to the proposed state central heating and power plant and statewide radio and telephone projects and no longer is available for aid in constructing the capitol, according to O. C. Hockley, Oregon PWA administrator.

NEWS BEHIND THE NEWS
 The Inside Story From The Capital
 By PAUL MALLON

 WASHINGTON, Jan. 6.—If the facts ever get out about Postmaster General Farley's Jackson day dinner promotional campaign, there may be a public clamor to make him director of the budget. The few insiders who have learned about his newly developed genius in putting over the $50-a-plate light snack repast are already calling his name—so to speak, of course.
 It may be too late for this year. The budget is today limping toward congress. But next year, some new dealers feel, a healthier appearance for it would be assured if the Farley optic-sandwich cure were tried on it.
 Modesty and opposition may forbid. The general's friends are manifesting a reluctance to talk, and he cannot be expected to. However, there are a few government employes in at least one department who are insisting that such genius should not go unnoticed. They will talk, if certain that no one will hear them. Through them you may get the details of this remarkable cure for deficits.

SUGGESTIVE POWER
 It seems the general's friends were correct in denying recently that the invitations to the $50 dejeuner were sent to all government departments. But this was only the initial come-on inducement.
 A follow-up man was sent around later. He merely went politely through the offices of this particular department with a list of names, asking each prospective guest whether he intended to come. Nothing more was required. The employes had been talking the matter over themselves. Certain of them pointed out that, after all, $50 is only 1 per cent of $5,000 and 1 per cent is a rather reasonable fee to pay for holding on to a job.

GENTILITY
 The follow-up man worked his way up to the office of a rather prominent official on the fourth floor of this particular department and asked: "Are you going to take pot-luck with us Wednesday night?"
 The official was resistant. He was afraid to say so and reluctant to say yes.
 The follow-up man, noticing his predicament, broke in to say: "Oh, that's all right. I'll mark you off the list. I have not had a declination today, and there should be at least one."

TECHNIQUE
 In the same department, there was a New York lawyer who carries his change in one of those old-fashioned clasp-lock purses, now generally used only by the ladies. Before the follow-up man came around, he told his associates brusquely that he was not going to lay out fifty bucks for anyone. One of his friends confided:

 "Things will be happening to you around here in 30 days, if you don't. They can make it very rough for you."
 When the follow-up man arrived, the lawyer unclasped his moth-eaten pouch. There emerged a check for $50.
 You can readily see what a national campaign like that would do for the federal deficit. A gentler sandwich or a more effective one would be hard to conceive.

CAUTION
 You may have noticed President Roosevelt made no detailed recommendations on neutrality in his Friday night message. This was not an oversight, but in keeping with the inside strategy of testing the congressional leaders get as much as they can. Both the White House and state department will lay low.
 Also, the ringing message was far more pleasing to the conservative groups outside congress than their published comments indicated. To them it meant a continuation of the breathing spell. They noticed it contained no new recommendations. The liberal groups also seemed to be pleased by the expressions of idealism.

 That is one reason why his White House associates have been telling him ever since it was the best message of his career.

Eels once were believed to come from the Shetland Islands, evolving from the hairs of Shetland ponies.

 The history of the horse shows it as one of the world's most curious animals. Its gradual change from a tiny many-toed animal, to one that walks on the end of a single toe, is without parallel.

 can't, the people of this country won't know what is going on. "Will that time," you ask, "ever come?"
 Well, when the constitution of the United States is referred to in the very highest governmental circles as a "relic of the horse and buggy days," it is hard to say.
 A NOTHER interesting news paragraph:
 "French newspapers, despite a brusque denial from the foreign office, said today that France has asked Great Britain if, in the event of war with Italy, she will be willing to send British troops to the German border to replace polius who might be needed in the south."
 That is a trick question.
 All things new stand, France has no intention of going to war with Italy, and England has no intention of sending British troops to the German border.
 The diplomats of both countries have their fingers tightly crossed when they talk to each other.
 Mussolini is one national hero who won't let his people place him on a pedestal. Not while there's a balcony around.
