The Family Doctor

By DR. MORRIS FISHBURN Editor, Journal of the American Medical Association, and of Hygeia, the Health Magazine

THE numerous conditions which may affect human speech are of special interest to the doctor because changes in the speaking voice may help in diagnosing diseases that are otherwise hidden.

The most common change in speech is hoarseness. Hoarseness is seen so often that frequently it is dismissed with little attention. Hoarseness is, of course, a symptom of trouble with the larynx, but this does not mean that the larynx and the vocal cords are necessary for speech. Dr. James S. Greene points out that a cat has no vocal cords, but that it has a voice with a wide range of sound.

The conditions which may affect the vocal cords, making operations necessary, include tumors, cancers, burning with lye and caustic substances, and tuberculosis. Because of the multiple conditions which may be involved, it has become customary for specialists to study every case of hoarseness seriously.

When a patient has a cancer of the larynx, involving the vocal cords, the doctor always explains that the matter of first importance is to get rid of the cancer. Most patients immediately want to know whether or not removal of the vocal cords will make it possible for them to talk. Nowadays it is possible for doctors to tell patients that this operation does not mean inevitably a destruction of the voice.

Several different devices now enable patients to speak even after a complete removal of the larynx. All that the larynx does is to develop a sound out of a column of air. Speech is molded by the tongue, the cheeks, the lips and the palate. When the larynx is removed, the patient has to learn to collect air in the throat, the esophagus and the stomach to replace the air column in the lungs.

Next the patient learns to produce tone by means of the other tissues. Experts have developed regular voice lessons for people who have had their larynx removed.

Recently an eminent physician sent a questionnaire to 30 patients on whom he had operated, during the past 10 years, for removal of the larynx due to cancer. Eighteen said they had
