FOOD PRESERVATION BULLETIN AVAILABLE

A new bulletin, recently published by the Oregon State college, has been received by the home demonstration agent's office. "Home Food Preservation" is the title of this publication and includes information and instructions on canning, drying, salting, smoking and storing various kinds of food products. This is a revision of previous publications of the same subject. Miss Lucy Case, nutrition specialist, at Oregon State college, states that the bulletin gives trials and schedules which, if carefully followed, will give successful results. She says that the final success, however, depends on painstaking care of the homemaker in following each step. This is particularly true to processing temperatures. It is important that the temperature prescribed be high enough so that foods are adequately processed in the required time.

The bulletin includes directions for canning vegetables, fish, and meat. Processes described include the hot water bath, pressure cooker, and open kettle methods. One section deals with drying fruits and vegetables, another with curing, and one with miscellaneous methods, such as storing vegetables. A handy tabulated list gives a quick reference table for canning vegetables, fruit, meats, poultry and fish.

"The preservation of surplus products at home for family use or exchange makes possible a variety in diet and reduces the cost of living for many families," Miss Case points out. "By the use of home grown garden vegetables during many months of the year, and an adequate supply of preserved foods for other seasons of the year, it is possible for the average family to be supplied adequately with vitamins and other essential food elements with a minimum outlay of cash."

The new edition, Extension Bulletin No. 542, may be had from the office of Winnifred K. Gillen, second floor of the post-office building.

Defense Men Under Knudsen Learn to Say It Briefly

WASHINGTON, July 24 (AP)—Production experts of the defense commission are learning to say it briefly. Their boss, big William S. Knudsen of automobile fame, has a prejudice against turning pages. He wants each memo complete on one sheet.

Such terse reports are a keystone of the Knudsen system, a system that has turned out a million cars a year and now is turned to tanks, guns, ships and airplanes to arm America.

Knudsen, who rose from the bicycle shops of an earlier era to become a master of mass production in the age of gas bugs, runs the government's business as he ran billion-dollar industrial works for private business.

His small staff of assistants are men he trusts. Each of them does his own job without interference. Knudsen watches the curve of progress in daily reports—those one-page memos. By "decentralizing" thus, Knudsen runs his office without running a fever.

"You can't run an organization by pushing buzzers," he says. On his desk in the ornate office loaned him by the federal reserve board, Knudsen has just one telephone. His secretary, young Bill Collins who followed his boss from Detroit sifts out the needless incoming calls at a desk outside Knudsen's office.

The big man speaks softly—so softly that businessmen conferring with him sometimes have difficulty hearing him across his desk. Knudsen's comment on his new job was: "I'm getting up in the world. When I first came to this country I got $10 a week. Now I get $1 a year."

In the 40 years between, however he ran his annual salary from corporations up to $200,000 and $300,000.

The bicycle mechanics he had learned in Copenhagen gave the young immigrant, Knudsen his big opportunity in the new world. After working as a reamer in a Morris Heights, N. Y., shipyard and earning a reputation as an amateur boxer around the Erie railroad shops, he got a job "with a chance to work up" in the mills of a Buffalo, N. Y., maker of bicycle parts.

As the bicycle era faded, the plant where Knudsen had become assistant superintendent went into the manufacture of automobile parts. The plant was merged with the Ford Motor company in 1911, and two years later Knudsen took charge of Ford's 27 assembly plants in the United States.

During the World war, Knudsen shared responsibility—as he does today—for arming America's defenders. He controlled production of sub-chasing "liberty boats" for the navy and trucks for the army.

Few people know whether Knudsen and Ford quarreled, although their relations in recent years have been cordial. At any rate, Knudsen left the Ford organization, and one year later joined General Motors. In five years, he ran Chevrolet production up from 70,000 cars a year to 1,180,000 cars and trucks.
