A Little Relaxation

Battery C at Mess

Klamath Falls contact thus far with the upsurging national defense program has come chiefly through the activities of the Oregon National Guardsmen of this community, called by President Roosevelt to a year's training service.

Officially mobilized on September 16, the guardsmen, composing Batteries A and C of the 249th coast artillery, have made the armory their headquarters until entraining for Camp Clatsop on the Oregon coast. They have marched daily through the streets, giving a distinctly military touch to the downtown scene. The armory has been a veritable beehive, with training routine developed in its preliminary stages and strict military order observed.

When the guardsmen were mobilized, Governor Charles A. Sprague asked Oregon communities to do "something special" for their national guardsmen on the occasion of their call to the army service. Nowhere was there quicker or more wholehearted response than in Klamath Falls.

Initiated by the American Legion and a group of service club leaders, a mess fund movement for the two batteries moved rapidly to its first goal and now a reserve fund for further use is being built.

On the occasion of the guardsmen's final weekend in their home town, a colorful parade and a farewell party were arranged in their honor.

National guard activity was started in Klamath Falls in 1926, when Battery D of the 249th coast artillery was formed. About six months ago, Battery D's name was dropped and Batteries A and C were organized. Commanding officer of Battery A is Captain J. F. Olin and that of Battery C is Captain George D. Powell.

Major Theodore D. Case, former commander of Battery A, was recently promoted and is now executive officer of the first battalion, of which the two local batteries are a part.

The Klamath guardsmen have an enviable record for excellence at camp and at home, and the community salutes them as it bids them a proud good-bye.
