Snow-plowed Canyons Play Hob With Crater Lake Wild Life, Says Correspondent

By BECKY L. FOILES

Many interesting tales have been told during the past week about wild life found at Crater lake in the machine-made road-way snow canyons.

Since the walls of snow are now over ten feet in height, it is almost impossible for animals to get back over the bank after they are once in.

It has been surprising to many to find that squirrels will actually turn on a human. According to a couple of CCC boys who tried to chase a squirrel out of the cut so it would not be killed by passing automobiles, the boys chased the squirrel for almost a mile, when suddenly the creature became so tired it turned and jumped on them.

After getting into their hair and scampering up and down as if it thought they were tree-like possibilities of escape, the squirrel was caught finally in the hat of one of the boys, who tossed it back over the white wall into its forest life.

Martens are plentiful in the park and can become very tame. Some of the women in the area feed them on window sills. They are not frightened by the lights or noise in the houses. They are active and can jump high. They are the only animals that can easily jump out of the road canyons.

The study of winter animal life is interesting, and many pleasant hours are spent watching the creatures through unusual pranks.

SNOWSHOE RABBITS have also been found running along the roadways. They are interesting and unusual animals, due to the fact that at the approach of winter their fur changes from gray to snow white. The only way they can be detected against the snow is by their movements.

While one of the rangers was patrolling the roads he came upon a baby porcupine crawling along the cut. It was trying to find an opening for escape. With the aid of a shovel the ranger lifted the animal over the top.
