Juvenile Officer Reports Delinquency Declining Here

By GERALD MURRAY
County Juvenile Officer

An analysis of the picture of juvenile delinquency for the first six months of 1941 gives a very encouraging report. During this period the juvenile officer has handled 55 delinquent cases which were of a serious nature, and more than 87 per cent of these cases were boys. Not all these cases were adjudicated by a hearing before the judge. Either they were placed on informal probation by the juvenile officer, placed on probation from the bench, or committed to an institution. It is important to note that only nine per cent of this group were institutionalized.

If one should make a comparison of the percentage of youths committed to institutions as against the number of cases handled in which delinquency was present, but upon which no official action was taken, you would find that the number committed to institutions would be less than three per cent of the total cases. These figures do not include the number of dependent or neglected cases handled by the court.

The amount of crime committed by juveniles is definitely on the decline. This can be attributed to two very important factors: First, the extent of co-operation which exists between city and county officials who are directly connected with the problem of juvenile delinquency and its prevention. In many instances, this has been a major factor in saving some youth from a career of crime. In nearly every case, the city juvenile officer is contacted and the boy's problem is thoroughly discussed. Between the efforts of both offices, arrangements are often made whereby employment is secured, or proper provision is made for activity in some recreational program. Boys between 14 and 18 years of age need some form of recreation to occupy their leisure time. Also some vocational responsibility is necessary, and this is rapidly being taken care of through student work programs. Through the cooperation of interested business men, the opportunity is presented to boys who ordinarily waste their time loitering on the streets, to participate in some vocational training, by which they not only earn their own money, but their individual personalities are cultivated and their time is converted into some profitable enterprise.

Secondly, an understanding of the problem which confronts the boy and girl of today. This is a very vital factor in the readjustment to a new life, for any boy or girl whose environment in the past has contributed to delinquency. The juvenile officer must have the confidence of the boy. He must impress upon him the fact that both he and the judge are interested in him and in his particular case. The psychological factor that it is generally known among the boys that they will get a square deal and their confidence will not be betrayed, is of paramount importance. The inevitable consequence of such a relationship between the officer and the boy is cooperation, without which it would be impossible to find a proper solution.

The story of the youthful offender can usually be summed up into one sentence: "Impudent, incorrigible, failing in his school work, or not in school at all—recognizing no authority, staying out nights, running off with a tough crowd of boys and finally becoming involved in the commission of a felony."

Many parents say, "I can't do a thing with my boy. You put him away and make him behave." It is the work of the juvenile officer to attempt to salvage out of this almost disastrous start in life some hope for the youth involved. No boy or girl is born bad, but the environment of his or her surroundings can be a decided influence on their attitude toward society.

No effort is too great, if it will bring about a solution of this problem and help the youthful offender to rehabilitate himself in his community and become a useful citizen.
