PICTURES OF SEA MEETING GIVEN PRAISE

WASHINGTON, Aug. 16 (P)—The White House released a new batch of pictures taken at the historic sea meeting of President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill and — just like those of a Sunday picnic — the unposed ones were the best.

There was one of Mr. Roosevelt laughingly listening to Mr. Churchill tell a story, Churchill's face puckered, one hand holding a pair of gloves and the other gesturing mid-air. Incidentally, it disclosed that the prime minister wears slide fasteners on his shoes. Captain Elliott Roosevelt, wearing the braid of a White House aide on his army uniform, stands nearby holding his father's hat.

Then, on the other hand, there was a formal picture of the two principals and their highly-ranked associates. Dinner dress was worn, Churchill with a row of medals on the jacket which covers his stiff shirt. The president wears a soft white shirt and so does Harry Hopkins, the lease-lend supervisor. Hopkins' shirt is too big for him; either he had to borrow from a larger friend or the shirt dates back past his long, thinning illness.

No one is smiling and it is a toss-up who is the graver — Mr. Roosevelt or his undersecretary of state, the high-domed Sumner Welles.

There is one peculiarly dramatic picture. It was taken at the moment Prime Minister Churchill started down the gangplank of the U. S. cruiser Augusta. His back to the camera and President Roosevelt is standing at attention, his eyes on the departing visitor and his felt hat held over his chest.

A panoramic shot showed Sunday services on the battleship H.M.S. Prince of Wales under four of its big guns. The ship's crew is massed in attendance, a small band stands in formation in front of robed clergymen. Messrs. Roosevelt and Churchill are seated and behind them stand the other dignitaries.

In one informal picture, of the prime minister talking to ship's officers on the Prince of Wales, his cigar had an ash so long it seemed sure to fall, either on his clothes or on the shining deck.

FROM CHILD'S PLAY

While playing along the Orange and Vaal rivers, Boer children gathered pretty stones. Their collections were found to include carnelians, jaspers, garnets, agates and rock crystals, some of which were found to be real diamonds. Thus, from child's play, started the profitable South African diamond-mining industry.
