SEED TESTING AT HIGH LEVEL; WEEDS STUDIED

Approximately 6500 samples of seed from Oregon farms have been analyzed in the past four months at the federal-state seed testing laboratory at Oregon State college, according to figures compiled by G. R. Hyslop, head of the farm crops department. About 12,000 reports on purity, germination, and related information have been sent out concerning the samples.

An increase in seeds of such weeds as morning glory and wild radish, and of bulbils of wild garlic was reported this year. Any increase of these, and particularly of wild garlic, is serious as the latter is listed as a noxious weed in the southern states as well as in Oregon, says Hyslop.

A dangerous weed has moved into the Willamette valley from southern Oregon this year, with the appearance of the star thistle. While this is an annual weed, it is dangerous to forage crops, as its seed heads produce long, sharp spines that are objectionable in hay.

Average germination of cover crop seed was generally lower than in either 1939 or 1940, the report shows. Only about one-third of the vetch samples showed above 90 per cent germination and hard seed. Among reasons believed responsible for this lower germination are a drying out of top soil resulting in shriveled seed, some thresher injury, and insect pests. Crowding large than normal volume through the threshing equipment, as well as faulty adjustment, is probably responsible for the increased thresher injury, Hyslop believes.

Presence of honeydew on a high percentage of ryegrass seed indicated a considerable number of aphids, which sap the vitality of the plant and thus directly or indirectly affect germination of the seed. The dusting job for pea weevil control did not appear to be as effective as in 1940, he added. Some additional injury from vetch weevils and some plants killed or injured prematurely by insect larvae working on the roots were also noted.

To Seattle—Mrs. Fred Nichol and her young daughter, Marilee, are planning to leave next Wednesday for Seattle, where they will join Nichol who is employed in the Boeing aircraft plant.
