Better Shop For Christmas Early, Or It'll Be Ersatz

By SAM LOVE
United Press Correspondent
WASHINGTON, Nov. 21 (UP)—That big sack Santa Claus carries on his back has been socked by the war. Some of the bulges have been flattened completely.

This story is not designed to send little children to bed crying. Only to warn papa and mama that if their infants have their hearts set on certain kinds of playthings, they had better shop early, sure enough. It may be early or ersatz.

For one thing, wheeled vehicles, capable of bearing the weight and standing the abuse of an 8-year-old are already at a premium. Even baby-walkers are hard to get.

A survey of Washington toy stores and the toy departments of the large stores brought major and minor tales of woe.

With 30 shopping days left before Christmas, the stores look gay and crammed. But managers explained that a good deal of the toy displays were made of wood, cardboard and plastic objects and that some familiar items were depleted, changed or missing.

OPM priorities also have taken the umph out of others.

There are "full size" bicycles but, except for "holddover" stock, they lack the fancy chromium trim and fitting that do delight the junior G-man. Scooters are scarce. Balloon tires are noticeably shrunken.

Modern Air Scouts Show Greater Speed in Mission

SPOKANE, Wash., Nov. 21 (The Special News Service)—The Indian scout of Custer's day would be as out of place in Uncle Sam's modern army as a horse marine in the tank brigade.

The combination of an agile airplane and a quick-shooting camera has turned scouting into a game of precision and lightning speed.

To Major Ronald R. Walker, who commands the 12th reconnaissance squadron at the army's Geiger air field, even the scouts of World war I would seem like old fashioned putters trying to cope with the present day, streamlined scouting technique.

"I can send out a pilot and in 10 minutes or less he can produce a negative showing 300 square miles of enemy ground," says the major.

That noise you hear may be a hollow laugh from the ghost of Custer's scout or an audible yawn from the then-capable reconnoiterer of the last World war. But let the major explain:

"We have special photographic squadrons equipped to take pictures at top speed, develop them on the ride back and drop them off to the army's strategists by canister."

"During the old World war it took as long as two hours to process an air scout's pictures after he'd looked over the enemy's lines. It was a pretty fair system, for that day and age."

But the major will admit aerial scouting in that day and age was a bit more exciting.

understand the strategy of warfare almost as well as the generals."

Uncle Sam's picture scouts and their work are on a par with or better than those in Europe's armies, the major believes.

"However," he points out, "the real test comes only under battle conditions. We're getting a good idea now of our talent and instrument strength by missions the 12th reconnaissance, for instance, is making all the time."

Major Walker, who serves in the second air force, said the study of aerial scouting was going on continually in each of the nation's four air forces. Commanders have been given a free hand in developing their scouting forces with an eye to increased speed and efficiency.

Where Custer's scouts clung to the earth for safety from enemy eyes and guns, Major Walker's scout plays tag with the clouds for the same reason, but neither could operate entirely out of range of enemy weapons.

"Planes never get out of reach of those guns," he observes, "unless somewhere they build 'em to fly just under Mars and Jupiter."

The United States birth rate has turned upward, census records indicate. Provisional tabulations show 2,353,988 births reported in 1940 — an increase of 91,260 over final 1939 figures. The birth rate per 1000 population jumped from 17.3 to 17.9.
