Police Captain Talks
Strikers Back to Work

NEW YORK, Feb. 8 (AP)—After bidding his youngest son farewell as he left to be inducted into the army, Police Captain John Collins reported for duty at his Bronx police station. There was a sitdown strike, he was told, at the Acme Laboratory Equipment company, which manufactures medical supplies for the army.

Collins went to the plant. He talked to the idle employees. He spoke of young Americans fighting in Africa, in the islands of the Pacific, in planes over China, over Europe. He spoke of men still to be wounded in action, men whose lives might be saved by doctors using Acme equipment — if the equipment was delivered.

He promised that he, personally, would ask the war labor board for speedy action on the workers' complaints about wages and working conditions.

After five minutes, the employees began to eye one another. They marched to their benches and began to make medical equipment again.
