New York Stages Present Artists

Many Names on Eastern Billboards Familiar to Concert Goers in Klamath Falls

The Community Concert association drive, which ended this Saturday afternoon at two o'clock following a concentrated campaign by the sixty-odd workers, brought many interesting responses. But there was no denying that the community needs music as a morale builder, and after this past season's delightful concerts the town again looks forward to another year equally as thrilling.

Glancing through last week's issue of the New York Times, local music goers realize with a nice little sigh of pleasure that a lot of artists The New Yorkers and visiting firemen are seeing have appeared on our stage.

For instance that bang-up piano team of Vitya Vronsky and her husband, Victor Babin, are appearing in an all-Russian program at the McMillin theatre.

Corporal Edward Kilenyl, scheduled here last month but substituted by that whizz Witold Maluczynski, is getting a little time off from army duties to play a concert with the Philharmonic Symphony. He is also pictured in army uniform.

Helen Olheim, slated for our stellar attraction next season, is singing at the Metropolitan Opera house in "The Magic Flute," as is Charles Kullman who sang here several seasons ago when concerts were given at the high school.

The Don Cossack chorus appeared at Carnegie hall last week.

There is a two-column story about Paul Robeson and his new records. Robeson is also slated to sing at the Great Music Film festival along with Richard Taubert and the California Junior Symphony.

Mildred Dilling, harpist, one of our early performers here, gave "the peppiest, jolliest harp concert ever staged on this continent or in Europe," says The Times, when she appeared in Decorah, Iowa. It seems that Miss Dilling's gown and harp went on to New York and she stopped off in Decorah. An ancient harp was unearthed and Miss Dilling gave the audience a rare treat as she played, tuned, played and tuned again until "all were in the spirit of the thing."

This covers but one week's program in New York and each Sunday issue includes name performers who have been heard here.

Well, so much for that. We do have good music, good entertainment, and the movies, too, now on local screens, are three and four-columned in the New York Times.

Margaret Jean Watkins, Klamath county health department, laboratory technician, who resigned her position the first of March, received her orders to report for duty with the WAACs on March the ninth. Prior to that date she spent a few days with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. S. W. Watkins of Madras, Oregon.
