ing her to return to Elmira. Ed Bryan, who has often towed Pai's glider on other flights, is to fly her back from Chicago. All the way back, on an uneventful trip, Ed keeps thinking about the order Captain Carr has signed. When the plane arrives at Elmir, Bryan takes another order rom Captain Carr out of his from Jacket. Be compares signatures. "Miss Pai," he declares. This order Miss Stuart gave you I forged."

WITH no thought given to that detail at first, Pat Friday had discovered first in Cleveland and then in Chicago that she was "Miss Loraine Stuart, Captain Carr's fiancee." So, still to protect Jimmy, to help him toward the promised promotion, and generally help make the soaring flight a success, she had held to that harmless masquerade. But tonight at 10:30, room 1220 in the big Chicago hotel telephoned downstairs. downstairs.

"Send a waiter with a menu up here at once," the speaker or-dered, peremptorily. "And a servdered, peremptority, "And a serv-ant to unpack a suitcase."
"Oh, surely!" the service hostess was apologetic, "Are you—is this Miss Stuart's maid?"

"This is Miss Stuart herself! What's the matter with this place?"

"But-room 1220, you say? I "But—room 1220, you say? I didn't recognize your voice over the phone, Miss Stuart. And when you were downstairs you told us you wished to be left alone until morning, so I specifically ordered all servants not to disturb you. Is —is this the Miss Stuart of the transcontinental soaring flight?" Doubt sounded in her tone.

"Of course it is. Don't be stupid."

stupid."

"I'm sorry. The waiter and maid will be up immediately."

Loraine issued further orders. She wanted laundry and pressing done here in the night, and she demanded that it be finished before dawn. She needed lipstick because she had forgotten her own, and had the hotel service send up a drugstore clerk with eight different shades for her selection. She demanded that somebody come and take the several bouquets of flowers out of 1220, sent up as welcoming gifts for the lady passenger that afternoon. During this interval of petulant complaining and ordering and of getting herself refreshed, Loraine thought of her victory over Pat getting herself refreshed, Loraine thought of her victory over Pat Friday. The little snip had been squelched! It had been good to see Pat back off and leave the room, scared to death of a gum.

Loraine paused, inhaling smoke, and considered that part of it. She looked at the automatic pistol which she had used. Something inside her told her that Pat Friday actually hadn't been afraid. Indeed, Pat had seemed a little disdainful of the pistol, at first. But when Loraine had shown her that Army order—

when Loraine had shown her that Army order—Loraine chose to believe it was fear of the gun, too. She gloated silently over the triumph. Damn her! She'd taken all she meant to from that Friday person. But, even so— "I'm a little shaky," Loraine confessed, "What I need is a drink."

She ordered liguer sent up, and

She ordered liquor sent up, and during the short wait for it, she felt herself go really jittery. A reaction had set in, to leave her nerves jangling. It made her hate nerves jangling. It made her hate Pat Friday more. Friday was the cause of all this, obviously. Loraine grew bored with con-sidering it, and as the drinks took effect she felt spirited again. She reached for the telephone. "Con-nect me with Capt. James Carr," ahe ordered.

"Mr. Carr left orders not to be disturbed."

"Don't be ridiculous! This is his passenger on the flight!" THAT, of course got Jimmy at once. Loraine recognized his answer, and her own lovely voice flowed to him meltingly.

"Jim-mee darling," she cooed.

"Hey, that you, Loraine? By George!"

"Yes!"

"Are you all right? Say, this is great, your calling. But where in the devil were you this morning at 11 o'clock?"

"Jimmee, I want to see you, now."

"Jimmee, I want to see you, now."
"Sure wish I could. Say, we had a swell flight, Loraine. Clear as crystal all the way, but looked like we might have out-run a storm. Any sort of blow or rain there tonight, hunh?"
"Jimmee, I am in this hotel with you. Two floors down."
"What? Hey!"
He hurried down to meet her in the mezzanine lounge. He was

"Loraine!" he spoke softly, but in disappointment. "This liquor business—I thought we agreed—look, people who fly, and—" she stopped him by snuggling close and laughing in easy, too-intimate manner, and petting him and murmuring little cozy sounds. "You didn't wait for poor little me!" She started to pout, "Listen, Lorainel That flight was set for 11 o'clock!"

His tone, definitely ominous, knocked the pout right out of her. She resumed her softer technique. "We made a swell run to Cleveland and a mob was there to welcome us," he said. "But when we got here to Chicago—wow, Loraine, they all but gave us the town! You should have been along just to watch Pat, Say, you know what? That kid has something! I mean, she has! She had stage fright at first, but later she—"
Loraine kept control. Naively, Captain Carr praised the other
