Oregon Sport Notes

By BILL PHIPPS (Associated Press Staff Writer Pitching Relief for Fred Hampson)

The lash and larrup man, Little Henry Armstrong, has proved a lot of things during his stretch of making a living out of fist-fighting.

And one thing which might have passed unnoticed had it not been for his recent performance in Portland was that Jimmy Garrison is a good fighter.

Garrison and Hammering Hank staged a whale of a battle. Armstrong won, sure—but it was the kind of a tussle for every one of the 10 rounds that a guy could go a long way to see and still be satisfied he received full measure for his dough.

It was a good thing for the revival of boxing in Portland that Garrison did show well against Mr. Perpetual Motion. James had been built up to Promoter Joe Waterman and the National Boxing club to something approaching stratosphere levels.

Then along came Rudolph Ramirez, the crack Mexican welterweight, who gave Jimmy as neat a beating as was possible without a knockout, outright or technical. The cash customers saw a Garrison who didn't come up to the publicly handouts and they began to suspect a lot of things. Mainly, that Jimmy had been eased along, blown up with a string of fights with pushovers. They said so, too.

It is unlikely they would have made the turnstiles click merrily to see Garrison show again had it not been that his next bout was with Armstrong, who will draw 'em in anywhere anytime.

They packed the house to see Little Henry deflate for once and for all the bubble the Garrison was a good scraper. They got fooled—and they loved it.

The AP's WAF Conrad in a pre-fight story said it would be two fighting machines without reverse gears. That phrase was more on the beam than all the reams of publicity the promoters turned out. No one needed to have said anything else. That was it.

For 10 rounds Armstrong and Garrison went at it. They never stopped punching and neither showed the slightest desire to get on a bicycle.

This perhaps shows better than anything else just how hot a scrap it was: not once in 10 rounds did the referee have to
