Today's Roundup

By MALCOLM EPLEY

AS goes Oregon, so goes the nation, says the Oregon Voter, Portland political weekly. The Voter this week carries an interesting survey which shows Oregon as a better political index state than Maine.

Since it became a state, Oregon has voted for 17 out of 21 winning presidential candidates. That beats Maine's record of 15 wins.

We have always thought that Maine got its reputation as an index state because Maine was traditionally republican and for a long time republicans won most of the presidential contests. In more recent voting, elections, when the honors have passed back and forth between republicans and democrats, Oregon's vote has been a better index than Maine's.

Klamath county, we have been told, has never given a majority vote to a presidential candidate who did not get elected. We haven't checked that clear back, but we believe it is true. Hence Klamath is a good index county in a good index state.

Plane Wreckage Incident

YESTERDAY'S plane crash wreckage incident points to the need for army and navy officials filing formal information with local county officials when wreckage is left in remote places in the county.

In this case, two young hunters found wreckage of an army plane, that had been previously inspected and therefore bore no special significance. They did the right thing, however, in notifying local authorities. When the navy reported it had no planes unaccounted for, Sheriff Lloyd Low organized a small party to look over the wreck on the bare chance that it might be the remains of one of two civilian planes which mysteriously disappeared in Oregon a few years ago.

Had the army previously given the sheriff's office the exact location of the plane wreckage which had been left in the woods, the sheriff would have been spared his efforts.

Two Planes Still Missing

ON the scent of a possible story breaking the mystery of previously unreported planes, this scribe went to the Buck lake wreckage with Sheriff Low.

The plane is lying about a half mile back in the deep woods from the edge of dry Buck lake. Pieces of the wreckage are widely scattered as a result of a dynamite blast set off under the plane when it was decided it could not be salvaged. The top of one good-sized tree is broken where the plane came through the timber, and there are scars on other trees.

We soon became convinced the wreckage was that of the army plane that carried the pilot to his death last April. We recalled that Captain William Lawrence, who was riding in the plane, survived miraculously, and Eugene Walton, a nearby farmer, heard the crash and went to his aid.

We found flash bulbs and other evidences nearby that convinced us the wreck had been previously photographed. A match folder from the Busy Bee restaurant in Klamath Falls lay beside the wreck, and the Busy Bee here gets a bit of unexpected advertising.

A quick check when we returned to town left no doubt as to the identity of this plane. Hunters in the deep woods can still be on the watch for the remains of the plane of Mr. and Mrs. Dick Walbert, Medford, who disappeared in 1940 after leaving Medford airport, and the plane of Elmer Jeffries and Frank McKenna, who never reported after taking off from Eugene airport southward bound in 1941.

Marine Games

CAPTAIN CLYDE ROBERTS of the Marine Barracks football team was somewhat disappointed in the civilian attendance at the Marine-Willamette game last Saturday. Several hundred townspeople were on hand, but not the 1500 expected.

The marines have a fine team, and promise a lot of good football for Klamath fans this fall. They play the University of California Ramblers here tomorrow. To the folks who like football, we heartily recommend the marine games. They nicely fill in the local grid schedule this fall, which otherwise would be a bit short. Why not give our marines the kind of support we give our high school?

News Behind the News

By PAUL MALLON

WASHINGTON, Oct. 6.—The Dewey tax plan is a deftly politicalized composite of the several new and somewhat revolutionary tax programs publicized recently. The experts here generally think it will work. In fact it represents the currently-running thought in congress—the apparent inclinations of the congressional tax leaders.

The administration has not yet officially committed itself either through the treasury or White House, although, as Dewey noted, some unofficial administration spokesmen have been unofficially siding toward some of the ideas.

Low Taxes

THE theory, in its utmost simplicity, is to have a large national income and a low permanent tax structure—at least much lower than that of today. In short, it proposes to raise a lot of money by smaller taxes on larger prewar incomes—with complete abandonment of the old New Deal theory of tax and spend, soak everyone who has an income in order to raise funds for free flowing government expenditure (Keynes theory).

Unquestionably the government will be forced to these methods by impelling postwar factors, the basic theories of which were first evolved, or at least noted in this column, beginning a year or more back as you will recall.

Dewey kept his variation of the underlying theme in generalized terms. Ditching of the taxes on the lower brackets certainly mean cancellation of the victory tax.

But he did not say how much he would lower the income and corporation and taxes, thus avoiding the arguments involved in the new Ruml plan, that of the Committee on Economic Development (an organization of a group of top business men; endorsed both by the United States Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers).

But he did turn away from the Twin-Cities tax plan by ignoring its basic recommendation for a 5 per cent general sales tax, and as a matter of fact, the sales tax subject entirely. He wants to cut down excise tax (as do Ruml and C. E. D.) which are in reality sales taxes, so obviously he is against that method.

Practical Theory

BEHIND his reasoning apparently are some specific figures worked out by C. E. D. which indicate the theory is practical and would support the government. That plan contemplated employment of 55,000,000 persons at a 40-hour week on approximately present wages and prices to get the necessary $140,000,000,000 of income.

Out of that the government would take $20,000,000,000 in taxes, of which about $6,000,000,000 would be required for carrying the war debt and the other $14,000,000,000 would provide government expense, which will no doubt be much heavier than prewar due to necessities of national defense.

If national income goes above $140,000,000,000 they would use additional tax money derived therefrom, to retire the debt. Their basic rate on both individuals and corporations would be approximately the same, 16 to 20 per cent. I judge Dewey did not care to accept the details of any of these methods, but is in accord with their theory and, therefore, is swimming in the direction toward which the general tide here recently turned.

If just one of his points is realized, tax reform is assured. If a permanent basic tax can be evolved on a basis of common justice to all classes, the country can escape from the present madly-confused results of politically piling new tax adjustments yearly upon last year's complications.
