From sword-dancing and desert-experting for the movies to building engines for B-29 Superfortresses, is the wartime transition made by Syrian-born Albert Kasalrah, of Paterson, N. J. At above, he's pictured in Arab costume, such as he wore in Italian Valentino films. He played Valentino's son in "The Sheik," an advised producers on Middle East customs and ceremonies, eventually going in the business of setting up desert scenes for studios. At right, he's shown in his present role, as cormaker for Wright Aeronautical Corporation.

If, like millions of other folk, you've been shivering under winter's blasts recently, brush the icicles off your eyelashes and take a gander at the picture above. In a summery setting at Petersburg, Fla., Sara Woodrich and little Barbara hunt for shells on the beach.
