

LEE, WHITLOCK NAMED HEADS OF SALVAGE

Paul Lee has accepted the office of county salvage chairman, and Warren Whitlock has agreed to serve as city salvage chairman, according to announcement by civilian defense coordinator, Charles R. Stark. Both appointments were lined up by executive secretary, Roderick Finney, of the Oregon state salvage committee, during a recent visit to Klamath Falls.

Lee is succeeding C. M. Lohman, who resigned to enter business for himself. Whitlock's position is a new one, created to effect a stronger organizational setup. Mrs. Winnifred Gillen will remain county salvage chairman.

Chief aim of the new chairman is to broaden the number of persons and communities undertaking salvage activities. There will be no attempt to supplant existing programs, but special effort will be used to carry out all phases of the salvage program.

Collection of waste fats has been carried on with great success under Mrs. Gillen's supervision, and will continue along the lines already established. Paper salvage in the metropolitan Klamath Falls area has been well handled by the Junior chamber of commerce.

Collection of tin cans will be inaugurated as a major function of the county and city committees. Exact plans will be announced after reorganization of the committees has been completed.

KLAMATH BASIN IMPORTANT IN SEED INDUSTRY

An important small seed industry centers in the Willamette valley with vital production centers also being in central Oregon and the Klamath basin, according to an article appearing in "The Northwest's New Frontiers," a magazine published by the Great Northern railway.

Leadership during the past few years has been attained in the production of small seeds and the annual valuation of this particular phase of the agricultural industry in these areas runs into millions of dollars, the article states. Under good farming practices yields are satisfactory and the cash farm income important features of the farmer's program.

In the central part of the state the principal supplemental water is from the larger federally-controlled irrigation projects. Chief among these are the Deschutes near Madras and the Klamath irrigation project in the Klamath basin. The total acreage of the Klamath project is approximately 151,000.

Crops now being produced on the Klamath irrigated land include alfalfa, various pastures, wheat, barley, oats, hay and grain, onions, potatoes, a wide variety of small seeds, sugar beets and miscellaneous crops.

In addition to these crops, a very important livestock industry centers in the Klamath basin area, including cattle, sheep, hogs, dairy and poultry, the story said.

This article further states that the entire Klamath basin contains more than 300,000 acres of irrigable land that can be given supplemental water by irrigation, about half of which is in the Klamath project and is now being irrigated. The remainder is along Upper and Lower Klamath lakes, Wood river, Sprague river, Williamson river, and other streams where development is confined to the livestock industry.

HIGH SCHOOL News Notes and Comment

By JUANITA SHINN
Especially noticeable in the halls and classrooms today are the missing seniors—those who graduated at mid-term.

Because there were so many schedule changes to be made this morning, a 45-minute period of time was allotted to give the students, teachers and councilors time to make the necessary changes.

Following this period of time there was a short senior class meeting in the auditorium. Bill Abbey, senior class president, presided over the meeting which was called to inform the seniors that their pictures for the yearbook would begin tomorrow, and to tell them the procedure.

At the senior meeting, Bill also showed samples of the senior announcement that the class officers selected for this year's graduating class. Announcements and personal cards will be ordered from the Crown company as soon as the mechanics can be set up in home rooms for selecting personal cards and the script for printing them.
