OREGON PIONEER DIES AT ASHLAND

The many friends of Mrs. Sarah Staley Wilson, well known Klamath Falls resident, will regret to hear of her recent passing at Ashland. She had lived here with her daughter, Olive Wilson, who has been a teacher of domestic arts in local schools for many years.

Mrs. Wilson was born in Iowa on August 27, 1852, and crossed the plains with her widowed mother in 1864. Their wagon train crossed behind the big Missouri train and just in front of the little Missouri train, and since both had been ambushed by the Indians, they were compelled to depend upon the other trains for help.

The train followed along the Old Oregon trail, and many experiences encountered during the journey were always remembered by Mrs. Wilson. One was the severe electrical storm which so frightened the travelers that they decided to throw out their old fashioned hoop skirts so that they would not prove dangerous.

Another incident which impressed Mrs. Wilson as a young girl, concerned the women's apparel at that time. The women had become tired of their silt sunbonnets, and resolved to discard them when they reached The Dalles. This they did by throwing them into the Columbia river and watched them float down toward the ocean.

The family moved to Yoncalita, where as a little girl, Mrs. Wilson attended the school taught by Jesse Applegate, and later by his wife, Sallie.

Several years later she married John Wilson, also a pioneer, whose father was a member of the Applegate train. Of eight children, three are still living.
