Confab to Prevent Future Wars, Not Make Peace Treaty

By JAMES MARLOW
SAN FRANCISCO, April 25 (AP)—This is an ABC explanation of the United Nations conference which opens today.

First of all: it is not a conference to settle peace connected with this war.
It is a meeting to form a league or association to prevent any more wars breaking out after this war is finished.
Forty-six nations have sent representatives—delegates—here to try to form this league.
(We're taking a leading part in trying to create this league. We stayed out of the league formed after the last war. That league was supposed to prevent future wars. But it failed, as the present war proves.)

Advisers Present
The delegates have brought with them various kinds of advisers, such as economic experts to help them on the various problems bound to come up.

The delegates are not just sitting down and out of thin air going to figure out some kind of league.
They come here with a plan already prepared. This is called the Dumbarton Oaks plan.

Last summer and autumn this plan was drawn up by representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom, Soviet Russia and China.
It was called the Dumbarton Oaks plan after the name of the mansion in Washington D. C., where the representatives of the four nations met.

All this doesn't mean that the delegates of the 46 nations meeting here will just sign their names to the plan, say "Okay," and go home.

May Change Plan
On the contrary: they will examine the Dumbarton Oaks plan piece by piece. They may decide to change it around.

The plan as it stands gives the five big powers—United States, United Kingdom, Soviet Russia, China and France—a lot stronger position in the league than the smaller nations would have.
So, the smaller nations are not entirely happy about the blueprint in all its details. Therefore, there may be some bitter wrangling before everything is settled—if it is settled.

Highlights of Plan
Briefly, here are the highlights of the plan.

1. There would be a body called the general assembly. Every nation a member of the league would be represented in this assembly. But—should any nation, no matter how large, have more than one vote in the assembly?

That's a sore point. In a way, the assembly would be only a glorified debating society so far as preventing future wars is concerned. It would have no real power to that.

It would make decisions on things like disarmament. It would try to work out plans whereby the world through such things as better trade relations could obtain a better economic balance.

2. The power to prevent future wars would rest in another body called the security council. This council would have 11 members, representing 11 nations. Represented on this council permanently would be the United States, United Kingdom, Soviet Russia, China and France.
The other six representatives on the council would be elected by the general assembly for two-year periods each.

Now suppose some nation made warlike moves toward a neighbor. The council could vote to use the military forces of the league members to crush the aggressor.

When the council voted to take action against some aggressor nation, at least seven members of the council would have to vote for such action. And—all five of those big permanent members would have to vote "yes."

Veto Power Strong
If one of the big five voted "no" the league could not take action against an aggressor. Thus, if one of the big five was itself an aggressor, by voting "no" it could prevent the league from acting against it.

This may seem like a terrific chance for any of the big five to get away with aggression. But the diplomats reason that if one of the big five went on the war path, the league would break down anyway.

There may be some strong talk about this, too, by the little fellows.

3. Then there would be a world court. This would settle—or try to settle—by legal means nations' disputes which could be settled by legal means.
But when the chips were down—when another act of aggression stared the world in the face and only united action could stop it—it would be that security council that held the final say-so.

Fertilizer Shortage Relieved in Basin

The acute shortage of fertilizer in the Klamath basin was relieved some yesterday and today with the arrival of 14 cars of fertilizer, 10 at Hatfield siding and four at Stukel siding.

The shipments were received by John O'Neil, distributor and potato buyer for George Burger of Klamath Falls. The cars were sent by the Pacific Guano company of Canada. These shipments were ordered last year and farmers are getting 61 per cent of the original order.

Some farmers will not get any fertilizer at all and they plan to sidestep later if more fertilizer is available.
