When Oldsters Marry By EARL WHITLOCK

Every once in a while, when a couple well along in years gets married, you hear people snicker at the notion that two people so far along in years should want to emulate the young and have their romance. But here's a thought of Booth Tarkington's I ran across that applies to that matter and that I want to pass along to you.

"It is love in old age"—says Tark—"Love no longer blind, which is true love. For love's highest intensity doesn't necessarily mean its highest quality. Glamour and jealousy are gone, and the ardent caress, no longer needed, is valueless compared to the reassuring touch of a trembling hand. The understanding smile of an old wife to her husband is one of the loveliest things in the world."

"Memory Garden is open."

Next Monday Mr. Whitlock of the Earl Whitlock Funeral Home will comment on "Happy Men."
