

Soviet Air Plan Calls For Ten-Fold Increase In Operations By 1950

WASHINGTON, June 25 (AP)—Russia expects to increase its internal airline operations ten times by 1950.

This prospect is outlined by Air Marshal Fedor Astakhov, chief of civil air service, in a report based on an important aircraft industry conference held recently in Moscow.

The air portion of the new five-year plan for Russia, Astakhov said in a statement distributed here, will:

- Increase internal route mileage to 108,789. (The United States had 74,739 miles of certified domestic air routes.);
- Expedite the design and construction of new planes;
- Construct new airports and improve old ones;
- Extend radio and other air navigation ground aids;
- Increase training of air crews;
- Develop air services to war on insect pests; and
- Expand aircraft ambulance services;
- Operate trunk line air services day and night in all seasons.

The Soviet also plans to open "new international routes," but Astakhov did not expand on that. He noted only that Moscow had air links with only three European capitals before the war.

The civil air chief pointed out that the Soviet's vast geographical expanse—about three times that of the United States—makes the speed of aircraft valuable, but at the same time raises special problems because of the range of climatic conditions within its borders.

He noted that last year Russian aircraft had visited nearly all of the world's capitals and that this year civil aircraft had been helpful in the election campaign.

The Moscow conference heard 26 reports on problems related to aircraft design and the aircraft industry. Three noted Russian aircraft designers, Alexander Yakovlev, Sergei Ilyushin and Andrei Topolev, are working on new types to meet the demands made in the conference, Astakhov said.
